However, it is not likely that Jimmy will attempt a conflagration on Mr. Reed's premises again, nor will he be allowed the privilege of playing with matches by any strategic movement he may make.

Eccentric Disciplin.

I am writing the scrappy sort of letter which is particularly obnoxious to the soul of the editor, and, therefore, take occasion to tuck in a story with a moral which, writes Arlo Bates in one of his Boston letters, was told the other day in a discussion on the training of children. A gentleman who is regarded as somewhat eccentric by the more conventional of his acquaintances, and whose management of his small son, a lad of some seven years, is especially amazing to the gossips, returned home the other evening to be met with the news that the boy had cut a hole in the drawing-room sofa.

"Well, my son," the father said, after being informed by the lad that he had done the damage under the pressure of an irresistible desire, such as is usually the plea of children in similar circumstances, "I am very sorry that you should spoil my sofa. I hav just paid $75 to hav it recovered, and I cannot afford to hav that done over again. The only thing I can see is for you to sit on that cut place when anybody is here so as to cover it. I know you don't like company very well, but I know your mother would be ashamed to hav callers see that hole."

The small boy knew his father too well to protest, and indeed for the moment he was probably only too happy to get off so easily. When, however, he had been summoned to sit on that cut two or three times things wore a different aspect. He heard the door-bell ring with apprehension, and when he was called for to run to the drawing-room he burst into wailing and weeping so violent that his presence had to be dispensed with.

"Now, my son," his father said to him, "I did not make any fuss when you cut my new sofa covering, and I can't allow you to make a fuss about bearing the consequences of what you did to please yourself."

The poor little wretch was reduced to a condition of despair pitiful to behold, when his father said to him:

"Now, Willis, I am going to make a proposition to you. You may do just as you please about it. I promised you a soldier's uniform at Christmas; now, if you had rather I took that money and had the sofa mended, I would put enough in it to get the thing done. But if I do you will get no uniform at Christmas."

The lad chose to hav the sofa mended, and at Christmas he bore his disappointment like his father's son. He did hav, it is only fair to his father to add, a good deal in the way of alleviations of one sort and another.

Perseverance and Pluck.

It is the steady workman who commands the best wages, the man who keeps at it. Newton kept at it for three years until he discovered the principle of gravitation, and Kepler was nearly a lifetime in working out his three laws of the universe. Morse kept at it with the electric telegraph until he turned failure into success, and Edison kept at it until he turned the phonograph from a toy into a world's wonder.

Success is rarely a matter of accident. Spirit and pluck always achieve great results. There is no such thing as luck.

"Luck!" said Wellington, "I make luck!"

Darwin was rarely able to work long at a time. He accomplished his great work by having a single aim and putting every ounce of his force and every hour of his time into the task which he had set before him.

He never scattered his energy, he never wasted an hour, and by steadily keeping at it, in spite of continual ill health and of long intervals of semi-invalidism, he did a great work, and has left the impression upon the world of a man of extraordinary energy and working capacity.

Correspondence.

MCMINNVILLE, ORE., Aug. 7, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never written to the Corner I will write to-day. I go to school and study fourth reader, spelling, arithmetic, and grammar. I am eight years of age. We take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I always read the Corner before anything else. I enjoy looking at the pictures. We received two TRUTH SEEKERS last night; one of them had no Corner. My sister has written to the Corner once before, and we got it back in the paper. I hav two brothers. One is named Samuel Farmer; the other, John. And two sisters. One is Mary; the other, Vina. My oldest sister is married.

As it is my first letter to the Corner I will not make it too long, for fear it will go in the waste-basket. ELMA FARMER.

DORCHESTER, NEB., Aug. 11, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I again write to you. Our school is out for two months' vacation.

We are having nice weather here. Plenty of rain and crops are good. The Blue river has been higher this year than it has been for fourteen years and it rose quicker than ever before. It rose fourteen feet in two hours, and then gradually until it was twenty feet above low-water mark.

There is a large colony of Amish here. They hav a large church and it is built in the shape of a large cross.

As their religion forbids them to marry any one not a member of the Amish church, they hav intermarried until they resemble one another. They hav excursions, and religious customs of washing feet; the ladies wash the gentlemen's feet and the gentlemen wash the ladies' feet. They will not associate with anyone outside their church unless it is absolutely necessary. This colony numbers about seven hundred, big and small. They first settled in Seward county April 3, 1873. In some future time I will giv you their history if you wish.

My grandpa has a large orchard. He has so many apples that he does not know what to do with them. He is feeding them to the hogs.

They are thrashing out their grain crops around here with steam thrashers. There is hardly a time, day or night, but that you can hear one whistle. I guess I will close now. I still remain.

Your little Freethinker,
JESSE A. JOHNSON.

MCMINNVILLE, ORE., Aug. 7, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it has been some time since I hav written to the Corner I thought I would try and write again.

I hav two brothers and two sisters. My youngest sister and I hav been going to school, but school was out July 17th. We had a pretty good time the last day.

My youngest sister is going to write this time and we will send our letters together.

We hav had no Sunday-school since last summer. I went part of the time. I hope there will be no more. It is raining to-day and has been raining ever since Tuesday and it is pretty muddy.

We do not get a paper every week, for we liv a long way from McMinnville—about ten miles—and we can't go every week.

Fruit is getting ripe but very slowly. It is too cold.

As this is my second letter to the Corner, I will not make it too long and tiresome, for fear it will take up too much space.

I will close, hoping this will not find its way to the waste-basket, wishing you success in your good work.

Your Freethinker friend,
VINA FARMER.

BENJAMIN, UTAH, Aug. 12, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I received your letter on July 20th and hav not answered it yet, but I am going to answer it now. I will tell you the reason I did not answer it sooner: I hav been sick and hav not been able to write. Yes, there is a lot of bees, and they giv us a lot of delicious honey, and we are very sweet. The honey is too sweet sometimes, but it is nice to hav all the honey you wish to eat. Yes, that is papa standing in the foreground of the picture, Luie in the doorway, and that is Lillie in the other doorway. She is my sister, younger than I. I hav another sister, younger than Lillie; her name is Rosie. Well, if you ever get to Utah come and giv us a visit and you can hav all the real honey you wish; you are welcome to the picture. I would send you some real comb honey, but I do not know how to send it. Kind regards to you all and good wishes.

I am going to tell about the bees. The workers first. The workers are the smallest bees and they gather the honey. They do all the work, and the queen bee lays all the eggs. She is a very fine bee; but the drones, they do not do anything, only stay in the hive and eat the honey that the other bees gather.

I received a book on August 10th called Freethinker's Magazine, and I guess it is from you. There is a lady's picture in it and I think it is Susan H. Wixon's. It is a very nice book. I shall take care of it. Thanks for sending it. LOUISA HONE.

[No, dear, we did not send the magazine. Perhaps it was sent from the office of publication. Thanks for your nice letter.—ED. C. C.]

NEOLA, IA., July 30, 1891.

MISS WIXON, Kind Friend: I am a new member seeking admission to your Corner. We do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but our nearest neighbor does and through him we hav made its acquaintance.

We liv five miles from the nearest village, and consequently I hav very little society.

My mamma and papa both hav been school-teachers and my life has been a roving one; so I believe I hav had as much, if not more experience than most girls of my age.

Living in the hotels, or boarding in the houses of others, usually I hav had the opportunity of coming in daily contact with new and different phases of life.

I hav never been taught to respect the church as an organization, though many of my dearest friends are members and of course I respect and love them.

Not that I believe the influence of the church has made them what they are, for I think they would do their duty to the best of their ability no matter where they were placed.

I hav, at times in my life, been wavering and wondering what was right, and as yet I hav found no creed or belief I could wholly trust and rely on. If Christians are asked to throw aside their doctrin, they, of course, ask what they shall take in its place. That is what I wish to know.

Do you teach no heaven, no hell, no God, no hereafter?

Perhaps this has all been talked over in THE TRUTH SEEKER before I began to read it; if so, you may not care to explain it all again. But I wondered if you meant that each person was to think as he pleased and not intrude his thoughts on others, but to strive in each and every way to do as his conscience bids him. That is what I try to do. I hope I hav not written too plainly, but I hav given my "free thoughts." I can say enough in favor of the temperance society. If all the boys and men of our country could say what Otto Wettstein said in his letter, what a grand thing it would be. I think it would be pleasant for the girls to hav a society. Girls hav not the great temptation of drink that boys hav, but there are daily little temptations and trials which only girls dream of; things to make them lose their tempers and be cross. Are we to be outdone by the boys? I say we ought to giv up some foolish pleasures as well as they, such as chewing gum, slang phrases (that most girls delight in), and I won't say novels, because there are many useful and instructiv ones, but I mean the low, trashy ones that only harm us. I am fifteen years old. I was most attracted by the letters of Helen Parrish and Otto Wettstein, but I liked all. I find a higher degree of intelligence and broader thoughts from the young folks than in most periodicals. I wish some of the "Infidels" near my age would correspond with me. Like the old man and the seven sticks, the closer bound the stronger.

I hav not a "Balaam" like Maud Kuffels, but I hav a nice, pretty pony that I love to ride. I am alone, without any brother or sister for company, and I would enjoy such letters as I see others receive, if any care to write. Yours truly, GLEE BRITTON.

P.S.—My address is, Glee Britton, Box 94, Neola, Ia.

[Thanks for your very sensible letter, Glee, and we shall hope to hear from you often.—ED. C. C.]

THE
French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparativ oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory,

To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 25 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is surs to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

MRS. MONTGOMERY, a wealthy and prominent lady of Taunton, Mass., has a sixteen-year-old daughter who, with dysentery and other troubles, has been sinking for some time while under faith cure treatment. Mrs. Montgomery's only regret, she says, is that she once infringed the treatment by giving a dose of blackberry cordial.

UNITED STATES government clerks are said to be organizing to secure service pensions.

THE cardinal of Paris says that the children of that city are rapidly being paganized by the godless schools.

MANY children of Baptists and Stundists in Russia hav been stolen to be reared in the Greek Catholic faith.

THE prisoners in the Atchison, Kan., jail recently became so interested in a discussion of scripture that they came to blows.

A PROVIDENTIAL visitation of especial mark was the striking of a group of three preachers by lightning, in Screven county, Ga.

GOVERNMENT compensation of ex-slaves for deprivation of wages while in servitude has been proposed, but probably will not be adopted.

TAKING advantage of the recent riots, England, France, and Germany may attack China and wrest territory from her, using a demand for guarantees of better security to foreigners as a pretext.

GERMAN papers disfavor our Exposition on the ground of "the growth of American hostility to everybody and everything outside the United States."

MISSIONARIES of the Russian church are urging the Holy Synod to coerce factory-owners to set a day each week for their hands to attend religious meetings.

THERE hav been exposed in Canada political abuses so atrocious that, in the words of the London Pall Mall Gazette, "a more sordid spectacle of corruption has never been presented by a free people."

ANDREW CARNEGIE at a late speech in Scotland prophesied that the time will soon come when the two branches of the English-speaking race will stand shoulder to shoulder for maintenance of the world's peace.

THE Rome ministerial press declares that if a foreigner is elected as pope on the death of Leo XIII. the government will not allow him to take the papal seat and will seize and sequestrate the Vatican property.

Two bills of Socialistic drift bid fair to pass the French chamber. One is to pension aged workmen, the other to make loans to farmers. Opponents urge against them, besides the usual anti-Socialist arguments against government assumption of private functions, the consideration that the systems will be abused like our army pensions and used to attach a class to the party in power.

MAYOR HEMPHILL of Atlanta, Ga., on Sunday the 9th allowed laborers to finish street work, necessary because fire-engin houses were blockaded. The pastor of Trinity church grew red in the face while denouncing the act, and had resolutions of censure passed. The most rampant of the resolutions were those of the Walker Street Methodist church: "The action of Mayor Hemphill in granting permission to citizens of Atlanta under such circumstances to violate a state statute as well as disgrace a law of the church of which he is an official member, is inexcusable, unwarranted, and criminal before God and man."

JOHN BEISBANE WALKER has provoked hostility by an address at the Catholic University in which he spoke of medieval bishops "who did not think they were guilty of an abomination in the sight of God when, in gorgeous capes, they . . . chanted Te Deums for the victorious returns of mailed thieves from expeditions of plunder, arson, and murder." These bishops were, he said, "impressed by the sacredness of property when held by robber barons." He complained of "a mob, at one time of half-fanatics, wild-eyed, illogical, full of pride or sloth or downright cruelty; at another of pompous clerics. . . . History has not pages enough to record the absurdities committed by Christian priests and princes."

EZRA PLUCKETH HIMSELF.

And when I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle, and plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and sat down astonished.—Ezra ix, 3.

Gems of Thought.

I HAV a higher opinion of the medical, or rather surgical, profession, than of any other. The practice of the law is too severe an ordeal for poor human nature. He who habituates himself to the distortion of truth, and to exultation at the success of injustice, will at last hardly know right from wrong. So it is with politics; a man must hav a conventional conscience. Of ecclesiastics too much is expected, and they consequently become hypocrits. As to soldiers, they are cut-throats and robbers, and not the less so because they are ready to send a bullet through your head if you tell them your opinion of them. But the mission of surgeons is to benefit mankind, not to mystify or destroy them or inflame them against one another.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

WHEN a nation begins to be civilized, it has some opinions which are quite false. It believes in spirits, sorcerers, the enchantment of serpents and their immortality; in possessions of the devil, exorcisms, and soothsayers. It is persuaded, that seeds must grow rotten in the earth to spring up again, and that the quarters of the moon are the causes of accesses of fever. A Talapoin persuades his followers, that the god Samonocodom sojourned some time at Siam, and that he cut down all the trees in a forest which prevented him from flying his kite at his ease, which was his favorit amusement. This idea takes root in their heads; and finally, an honest man who might doubt this adventure of Samonocodom, would run the risk of being stoned. It requires ages to destroy a popular opinion. Opinion is called the queen of the world; it is so: for when reason opposes it, it is condemned to death. It must rise twenty times from its ashes, to gradually drive away the usurper.—Voltaire.

IN the rational study of nature lie the secrets of knowledge, and every admission of the existence of supernatural influences is a barrier to progress.—R. O. Adams.

JESUS said: "I say unto you, that ye resist not evil; but whoever shall smite thee on the right cheek turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at law, and take away thy coat, let him hav thy cloak also. And whoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain" (Matt. v, 38-41). If our ancestors had always adopted this course, we should be slaves to-day. If the honest man, when robbed and smitten by the thief, should turn the other cheek, or offer his cloak when his coat had been taken, he would be positivly promoting rascality.—Moses.

IN the eyes of all truly competent men the question whether the universe, as we see it, is the result of regularly working forces, having a causal connection with each other and therefore capable of being understood by human reason, or whether it is the work of an automatic, incomprehensible being that admits of no recognition by the reason of man, has long since been decided in favor of the former alternativ. Every item of human knowledge, every page of practical experience, every conquest of science, givs but this one answer, and makes the old theistic theory of the universe, which originated in the days when mankind was still in its first childhood, appear as a mere fable, engendered by the rêverie of past ages.—Buchner.

I do not think it is scientific to say that . . . this world is only about six thousand years old, or that man has only been upon the earth for about six thousand years. If the Bible is true, Adam was the first man. The age of Adam is given, the age of his children, and the time, according to the Bible, was kept and known from Adam, so that if the Bible is true, man has only been in the world about six thousand years. In my judgment, and in the judgment of every scientific man whose judgment is worth having or quoting, man inhabited this earth for thousands of years prior to the creation of Adam. On one point the Bible is at least certain, and that is, as to the life of Adam. The genealogy is given, the pedigree is there, and it is impossible to escape the conclusion that, according to the Bible, man has only been upon this earth about six thousand years. There is no chance there to say "long periods of time," or "geological ages." There we hav the years. And as to the time of the creation of man, the Bible does not tell the truth.—Ingersoll.

WORLD-WEARY—CONSIDERING HOW TO BECOME A SAINT.—(Sequel next week.)

Notes and Clippings.

Rev. M. Leavell, of Chicago, said in a late sermon: "Bicycles may be useful in their place, but I know many a young man is riding to hell on a bicycle on Sunday."

Edgar Fawcett, the New York novelist, says: "Poetry now tends in the direction of science. I believe our coming great poet will be a great Agnostic—not necessarily an Atheist, but Spencerian in his creeds, however artistic in his technic. Greek myths and art are worked out."

Says Sam Jones: "If any college ever confers on me the degree of D.D. I will sue them for damages unless it be understood that the term may mean 'Sam Jones, devil driver.' We need a lot of devil drivers, but I hope none of them will ever get where I saw a dog hunting a fox. The dog was in front."

Mrs. de Navarro, formerly Mary Anderson the actress, relates: "Mr. W. S. Gilbert, who knows that I am a Catholic, likes to tease me a little about it. He told me once a story about a man who was killed in a railroad collision, and when he got to heaven they wouldn't let him in because he had died without absolution. 'Well, that isn't my fault,' said the man. 'If I had had time I would hav seen a priest, but I was killed in a collision. How could I get one?' St. Peter didn't see what he could do, although it did seem hard that the man should hav to suffer without its being his fault. 'Can't you get some priest in there who will come out and giv me absolution and then it will be all right?' This seemed a good way of fixing the thing up and St. Peter went off to get the priest. He was gone some time and finally came back alone, looking distressed. 'There isn't a priest in the place!' he said."

On a recent Sunday the Omaha World-Herald sent reporters in ragged guise to the churches, and they were received unwelcomely in some and favorably in others. The lamentable feature, however, in the eyes of the Omaha Christian Advocate is that "every reporter, all day, in all the churches, and even in the barracks, escaped conversion. If, in those churches where they are scandalized and outraged, they had not been reached by the grace of God, it would hav proved nothing as to their incorrigibility, but if," in the other churches, "where others were saved, not one reporter was led to forsake his sins, it well-nigh establishes the unreachableness of that class."

Probably no man living has made more thorough and intelligent study of racial traits than Herbert Spencer. We hav warrant, therefore, for accepting as fact his statement, demonstrated by experience and observation, that it is virtually impossible for a Russian to tell the truth. Thus has Herbert Spencer drawn the sting in advance from the allegations about the Jews of Russia made by Prof. Nicolas de Gondatti, secretary of the Imperial Society of Friends of the Natural Sciences, Anthropology and Ethnology of the Polytechnic Museum of Moscow, who has been favoring Chicago with his distinguished presence. Were disproof of Professor de Gondatti's calumnies against the Jews required, it is to be found in his statement that "all relig.ons—Catholic, Protestant, Orthodox, and Mohammedan—abound in Russia." The Orthodox Greek church does abound in the empire, and it alone. It is equivalent to crime almost to be of any other communion.—Chicago Post.

Orangemen and religious fanatics hav all helped to giv the beautiful city of Toronto a malodorous reputation in this country. For many years, complains the Catholic Review, the officials of the city hav winked at the insults and outrages heaped upon Catholics through the public press and in the public places. They are now receiving large doses of their own medicin. As a city of cranks Toronto far surpasses Chicago. Its street preachers and pulpit fanatics are numerous, and they can form and start a mob in thirty minutes. One of these mobs had possession of Toronto's park two Sundays ago, stoned the police, smashed the mayor's hat, destroyed property, and otherwise misbehaved.

Says the Portland Oregonian, referring to Calvinism: "This ruin of a once mighty body, second to the church of Rome in its power over the minds of men, may seem deplorable to others than believers in its spiritual pretensions; but it is apparently inevitable. The chain of reasoning that leads to this conclusion is short and simple. Within the last generation, the labors of historical criticism and comparativ research hav destroyed the belief of scholars in the inerrancy of the Bible, undermined their faith in it as a special and exclusiv divine revelation, and so broken down their reliance upon it as an absolute and sufficient rule of conduct. The researches of scholars hav made it certain, as to the rational mind it was always probable, that the Bible is a body of human literature, produced by a people in various stages of a long and checkered national existence, subject, like all national literature, to anachronisms, interpolations, clerical errors, intentional imposition, and unconscious perversion, and reflecting, in every word and line, the mental and moral attitude, point of view, and development of that people at the moment when that word or line was produced."

At Moscow in March unmarried Jews or those who were married but had not their families with them were packed off like criminals under an armed escort to the Pale of Settlement. The married people were turned into the street, regardless of the condition of the women, those who had lately given birth to children or who were on the point of doing so being included among the others. Then their goods were bundled out after them and their houses closed. The people so expelled hav to take to the woods or cemeteries to escape the jeerings of the mob. Later the quarter of the city itself where the Jews dwelt was invaded by a force. All the streets were closed and at 2 in the morning the raid commenced. Those whom the police decided to be dwelling there in violation of the law were thrust forth, and more than four hundred persons were kept imprisoned till the following afternoon in the foul-smelling atmosphere of two small underground chambers beneath the police offices. There were so many of them crowded into these small rooms that they were forced to stand the whole time; they were not allowed a drop of water to drink and had not a thing to eat.

Communications.

The Christian's God on the Rampage, with Side-shows.

This has gone far enough; it is time to call a heavenly halt. The gods should be pent up, poked, hoppled, tethered, or hamstrung. It may be sport for them to play with tornadoes and tarantulas, with flood and fire and famin, with thunderbolts and earthquakes, but it is often very inconvenient and even dangerous for us.

If Christians will persist in keeping a pet God, they ought to be compelled to control him and keep him within reasonable bounds. People hav no right to keep savage dogs and pet bears and vicious bulls to annoy us and endanger our lives.

When a ruler tramples down the rights of his subjects and harasses them with unnecessary wars and loads them down with taxation, the people sometimes rise in their might and depose him, and often his head rolls into the basket.

The right of revolution is a sacred right. It is the last resort when matters become unbearable. I hav got desperate, and think it is better to fly to ills we know not of than to bear those we now hav. I am for revolt. I am going to preach a crusade against the unruly and disorderly conduct of the gods.

It is high time for the people to protest against what Christians are pleased to call acts of divine providence. It is unreasonable for those who hav found out that a God is not necessary to be constantly suffering from those acts of divine providence just for the accommodation of Christians.

I want to know what right they hav to keep a God whom they claim they can control, to roast infants and damn honest people, and destroy their property by flood and fire, and sacrifice their lives by earthquakes and tornadoes, and demolish their houses with thunderbolts and reduce cities to a scene of desolation by the vomiting of volcanoes?

If Christians want such a God let them keep him on Christian territory exclusivly, so that he will not afflict those who hav no interest in him, and who are justly entitled to immunity from his depredations.

Christians say that he is a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God—that he has a greater care and regard for his children than an earthly parent can hav; that he numbers the hairs of our heads, and that a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without his knowledge.

If these things are as stated, Christians must hav entire control of God and ought to be held responsible for all his outrageous acts.

Why should there be disasters by drouth and fire, by flood and famin, when God answers the Christians' prayer? Could they not pray to him to stay epidemics, and not to draw in his almighty breath and swell himself almost to bursting and then blow out a hurricane to destroy the shipping and level down our houses? Should the earth be shaken up with earthquakes, when all that is necessary is for the Christian on bended knees to ask him not "to do so any more," when one touch of his almighty hand to the regulator would make things as peaceful and quiet as a sleeping child?

For the last month I hav scarcely taken up a paper that did not giv an account of a cloud-burst or hail-storm or tornado which did great damage to property and destroyed human life to a greater or less extent.

Why do not Christians pray to God to hav some regard for his character, and not slop over and act as though he had been taking a swig from "old black Betty" and was "half seas over" and did not care a continental whether he drowned a country with a flood or ripped it up with an earthquake. If I were going to be a god, I would be a dignified god, and keep up a respectable appearance, and show that I had some regard for my ancestors, and would conduct myself in such way and manner as to make the people respect me.

But for a God to get mad and storm around and swear in his wrath, and send a flood to drown a whole country, or a hurricane to send everything flying through the air, shows that he has no respect for his standing among other and decenter gods, and that if it were not for the efforts of a few Christians nobody would hav the least respect for him.

I once showed Bennett's "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" to a man who was piously inclined; and such frothing and foaming, such feats of ground and lofty tumbling, such lofty flights of profanity, were never witnessed or heard since the time that Moses broke his slate. He said it was the G—d d—ndest piece of blasphemy that was ever pulled through human lips. And I expect that many a minister who reads this article will throw up his heels and rub his face in the dust and froth at the mouth, and call down the curse of God upon us. But he does not pay any attention to their prayers, and I do not expect that he will hand down any curses on my account. Besides, I shall fare just as well whether they ask for blessings or curses.

We had a cloud-burst in this vicinity a short time ago, and three towns were washed out and guttered, and thousands of dollars' worth of property destroyed. Barns were carried away, houses were flooded, furniture damaged or destroyed, carpets were under mud a shoe deep, wagons and carriages were carried away and broken up, orchards uprooted, bridges swept away, sheep, swine, and poultry were struggling in the strong current, and many stout hearts quaked with fear, expecting houses would be carried away, and human life sacrificed to the unrelenting element.

Crops were not only swept away, but the land upon which they were growing hopelessly ruined by having the soil torn away down to bed-rock. Acres and acres of land were rendered worthless by being covered with flat stones and boulders, so that it would cost more to clear the land than it would be worth. It will cost many thousands of dollars to repair the bridges and make good the damage done to the public highways.

I went to the upper part of the town the next morning after the flood, and was looking over the wreckage, busy with my own thoughts, when another man appeared upon the scene.

I pointed to a house close by where the front yard was covered with mud ankle-deep; the carpets inside were covered with mud to an equal depth, the furniture had all been carried away, and it was expected that the house would be carried off by the strong current.

I called his attention to the uprooted fruit-trees, broken carriages, fragments of wire fence, logs, timber, and lumber, scattered in wild disorder as if the demon of destruction had been having a holiday.

"Now," said I, "suppose some individual had been clothed with power to stop this flood, and prevent this great destruction of property, and had refused to do so, what would you hav thought of him?" "They would hav hanged him to the first lamp-post," replied he.

"But," said I, "God could hav stopped this flood at any moment by the mere fiat of his will, and did not do it. What is culpable in man is culpable in God. Therefore we ought to hang God. Are we not driven to the conclusion that he is not interested in our welfare, or that he does not possess the power attributed to him?

"This lesson teaches us, and it ought to be burnt into our very souls, because it is so often repeated, that God pays no attention to us poor earthly mortals, not even those who bow themselvs the lowest in the dust to curry his favor.

"Christians hav an idea that they are special favorits of God, and that he stoops to show them favors which are not granted to ordinary mortals. Let us bring this idea under the focus of common sense and experience. Years ago there was a minister who took it upon himself to lecture me on many occasions in regard to my disobedience to God and my lost condition, and the great danger I was in of being relegated to that torrid country where the worm dieth not and the whangdoodle weepeth."

My honest answer in regard to the scriptures and God and his dealings with men, to him seemed almost blasphemous. He was a man who preached and prayed and exhorted a good deal.

Now let us see how God dealt with and awarded this his most faithful and devoted servant. In the first place, he had a son brought up in the fear and admonition of the Lord, for whom he had to pay over ten thousand dollars to clear him from the meshes of the law and keep him out of the penitentiary. Then God sent a great hail-storm and destroyed all his crops; then he smote him with rheumatism, so that he could scarcely crawl about for four or five years, and then killed him.

Thus he frequently tears off a man's scalp who is oftenest upon his knees and shows a willingness to eat dirt for God's sake.

And that is just the way God acts. He never could be depended upon—he is fickle and unreliable—often letting his blessings fall upon the undeserving, and sending his curse upon the needy, the helpless, and unprotected. When a man has been consecrated to the service of God, and rubbed with salvation oil, and is down upon his knees, flattering him and telling what a great and powerful being he is, and how tender and merciful he is, how he watches over the interests of the faithful, God sometimes sends a bolt from his great celestial fireworks and knocks the light out of him.

If a man should treat his friends in that way, would he be entitled to the respect of his fellowmen? Must not the minds of men be under some strange hallucination when they adore in a God what they would despise in a man? I, a blaspheming Infidel, as some Christians regard me, was not injured in the least by the late flood, while some of God's praying flunkies were terribly torn to pieces.

The truth is, God's providences are like the Irishman's gun, as liable to do execution at one end as the other. When the Christian thinks he is at the safe end of the gun, it kicks back and givs him a black eye.

A governor sets apart a day for thanksgiving and prayer, and all the people go down on their knees and utter a great many lies to their imaginary shadow beyond the clouds, by telling him that every blessing which they enjoy comes from his bountiful hand, and that he is tender and compassionate, and while they are so thankful and everything is lovely and the goose hangs high, he sends a hail-storm or a flood or a cyclone, and wipes out their crops or inundates the country or levels down their houses.

Talmage says that God has a sympathy for anybody in any kind of toil.

That is a big lie and everybody knows it, and nobody better than Talmage. There are millions all over the world who are toiling and starving and God shows his sympathy by letting them toil and starve. Does Talmage not know this fact? But people are generally dishonest or ignorant in proportion as they are orthodox. It is the skeptical who draw attention and excite comment because they are mentally keener than those who train in the hallelujah phalanx. To the Christian, salvation is the great concern of life. "Better be in heaven in ignorance than to be in hell with knowledge." Salvation before knowledge has always been the position of the Christian. Is it any wonder that such teaching should turn out a class of dullards? The few who are really shrewd who are still identified with the bullhead fraternity, like Talmage, are as dishonest as they are shrewd.

He says, "God knows how heavy is the hod of brick which the workman carries up the ladder on the wall." But does God make the hod one brick lighter? "He hears the pick-ax of the miner down in the coal shaft." But does he lift one iota from the burden of the miner's toil? "He knows how strong the tempest strikes the sailor at the mast-head." But does he lift his almighty finger to abate the storm, though the vessel should go down and all on board should perish? "He sees the factory girl among the spindles, and knows how her arms ache." But does he lighten the burden which necessity compels her to bear? Does he send her food or clothing so that she will not be compelled to work so hard? "He sees the sewing-woman in the fourth story, and knows how few pence she gets for making garments." Does he send the ravens to her with food, or multiply the few loaves and fishes which she is able to buy, so that she will not hav to work so hard to get a living? "When a man begins to go down, he has not only the natural force of gravitation but a hundred hands to help in the precipitation." Does God sustain him, does he stay the hands that would "precipitate" him? "And louder than the din and the roar of the great city, comes the voice of a sympathetic God, 'Cast thy burden upon the Lord and he shall sustain thee.'" "A woman had a dreadful abscess from which she had suffered untold agonies, and all surgery had been exhausted upon her, and worse and worse she grew until we called a few Christian friends together and began to pray about it. We commended her case to God, and the abscess began immediately to be cured. She is entirely well now, and without knife and without surgery. O ye who are worn out with agonies of body, go to Christ. O ye who are sick, 'cast thy burden upon the Lord and he shall sustain thee.'"

I wonder if the fountain of all knowledge, the great oracle of the Tabernacle, the trained monkey of Brooklyn, ever heard of the great earthquake at Lisbon, the city of churches and convents, which engulfed thousands of both sexes and of every condition in life—the most Christian people in the world. Did the Lord sustain them?

I wonder if he ever read of the destruction of Pompeii and Herculaneum? I wonder if he ever heard of children dying when tender mothers were bending over them in prayer? Did he ever hear of vessels going down while all on board were raising their voices to the great Hoorah beyond the clouds? Did he ever hear of mothers starving themselvs in order to hav something to giv to their half-famished children? Is it possible that the fact never came to his knowledge that a whole nation was down on its knees asking God to spare the life of Garfield? Does he know how many called upon the Lord in vain at the great Johnstown disaster? Does he know that the cholera and yellow fever swept off thousands of thousands of human beings, and how many prayers were offered up to hav the plague stayed? Did the Lord pay any attention to their petitions? Did he sustain them in their afflictions? Now if none of these facts ever came to the knowledge of Brooklyn's great spiritual Juba Dancer, then he may hav made the foregoing statements innocently. But if he had knowledge of these facts, then every statement is a palpable lie. If he does not mean that the Lord tempers the wind to favor the sailor at the masthead then his language is without meaning. And yet he must know that many vessels go down in a storm—he must know that in his own city are hundreds of sewing-women working for starvation wages whom God pays no more attention to than the heartless wretches do for whom they toil.

Not long ago I read of a poor half-starved girl who, driven to desperation by hunger, took a loaf of bread. Did the Lord sustain her? No. If he helped anybody he took up on the other side—for the unfeeling brute of whom she took the bread had her arrested and put into the lock up.

The truth is, when Talmage does the spread-eagle act in the pulpit, Christianity is all wool and a yard wide, but when put to the test of common sense—it turns out to be the flimsiest kind of shoddy. Only look about you, Mr. Talmage, and you cannot help but know how deeply you lie and how grossly you deceive the people. And it is all the meaner because thousands hear your false assertions and without consideration believe them to be true, and "cast their burdens upon the Lord" only to find when the fatal hour comes that he pays no attention to the wail of sorrow and leaves them to be overwhelmed in the billows of despair.

Many ministers carried away by the tide of superstition and false teaching, unwittingly preach false doctrin. But you, Mr. Talmage, utter these terrible falsehoods with a full knowledge of what you are doing. In my judgment you hav no equal as a falsifier of facts in this country.

Pope said:

> For never was it given to mortal man
> To lie so boldly as we women can.

But I think if he was among us at the present time and acquainted with Talmage he might write something like the following:

> No mountebank or lying flunkey
> Can hope to equal Brooklyn's monkey.

No man knows better than Talmage that God does not help the needy; that when the hungry cry to him for bread he lets them starve; that he has no sympathy for the suffering; that when the sorrowing go down on their knees in tears he renders them no assistance. What do we want of such a God? Mr. Talmage, if you want a God of that character, tether him or hamstring him and keep him in Christian bounds, as Christians will be welcome to all the blessings which can be derived from him. The more intelligent classes no longer believe in a Talmagian God, located somewhere above the clouds seated on a big white throne, in human form, with head, and hands, and feet. A God who talks with men, and walks around occasionally to see how things go on, as in the case of Sodom and Gomorrah and the tower of Babel. A God who shows special favor to robbers and cutthroats and damns others a hundred times more deserving—even innocent children. But they believe in a great intelligent First Cause who rules and governs all things, who fills the immensity of space, pervades all matter, is as much in a mite as a mountain, and who takes cognizance of everything which occurs.

But I apprehend that those who entertain this more enlightened view hav never considered the immeasurableness of this God and his attributes.

Go in any direction until you come to the boundary of space and multiply the distance by two and then you will hav some appreciation of the size of a God who fills the immensity of space. And yet this God will not weigh a simple ounce. It is a principle of philosophy that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time, and if God fills the immensity of space there cannot be room for anything else.

But the Christian answers that God is not a substance but a spirit. John says: "No man hath seen God at any time," and I guess that he is correct, for I hav never seen him and I never saw a man who has seen him, or touched, tasted, heard, smelled, or handled him. And I say that a thing which fills the immensity of space, which has no weight, and cannot be felt, tasted, overheard, without length, breadth, or thickness, and which is without body or parts, is nothing at all and does not exist.

This spirit, or being, or thing, is in every man, woman, and child—in land and water—in short, it pervades every substance, animate and inanimate. Therefore, when the mother draws the naughty boy across her knee and spanks him with her slipper she spanks God. Therefore, one part of God spanks another part.

Nothing can be done without the help of God. Therefore, when two pugilists enter the fisty ring not a blow could be struck if God did not nerve the arm of the slugger. Out West two men got into a fight and one chewed off the other's ear. Now, according to the Christian notion of God, he was in both of these men, and not only engaged in the fight, but bit off his own ear.

When the country was new a panther pounced upon a child in sight of its mother. The child would run toward its mother with outstretched arms and then the panther would leap after it and strike it with its terrible paw. The mother stood helpless and saw her child tortured and torn and finally devoured. Dare any Christian say that God could not hav closed the jaws of the cruel beast? And if God could hav saved the life of the child and would not do it, is he not a monster? But God was in the panther and also in the child, and therefore was tearing and crunching a part of himself. And when the panther had eaten part of the child a part of God was inside of another part.

According to the Christian idea, a murderer cannot pull the fatal trigger or administer the deadly poison without God's help. And then he is in the poison and in the powder, so one part of God kills another part.

I saw an account to-day of a man who went to drive a horse out of a lot. The horse tore off one cheek and then bit a great piece out of his shoulder, and crushed in the shoulder and then stamped his brains out.

Did God prompt the horse to kill the man, or did the devil do it? If the devil did it could not God prevent him, or is the devil more powerful than God, or hav they compromised and no longer thwart each other's purposes? If God could hav saved the man and would not do it, is he worthy of man's adoration? The Christian may say God killed him because he was a bad man. But suppose he was a good man, how then? Some years ago one of our village churches was burnt down, another was struck with lightning. Were these churches destroyed because they were bad institutions?

There is now a fire raging in California and it has burnt over eighty miles of territory. There is no water, and no way to stay the flames but by digging trenches. These the flames overleap and seem to bid defiance to the best efforts that can be made. At the present writing the flames are within a mile of the Lick Observatory. Great danger is apprehended that some of the delicate instruments will be injured by the intense heat or the whole plant wiped out entirely.

Could not God send a little rain to subdue the devouring flames? It must afford God infinit delight to wipe out millions of dollars' worth of property and destroy that splendid observatory, which has and would confer such lasting benefit upon mankind?

Christians claim that God's plans and designs are far beyond man's comprehension, but if understood he would see that they are all for the best. Then why not keep right on with fire and flood and famin, and sweep everything, man included, from the face of the earth, and leave it a blank? Would that be for the best?

If God brings us into this world only to afflict us, what assurance can we hav that when we are ushered into the next world we will not be doubly tormented? I am willing to throw up the sponge when I get through with this world, without taking any chances in the next, unless there should be a change of heavenly bosses. JOHN PECK.

SOME LETTERS TO THE PRESIDENT IN REGARD THERETO.

NEW YORK, Aug. 11, 1891.

DEAR MR. BEAL: I hav received your invitation to be present at the Oregon state Secular Union Convention at Portland, October 3d, 4th, and 5th. I shall certainly be with you. I regard this convention as of the utmost importance, and every Liberal should come if he can. We must join forces, all who are in favor of a total separation of church and state. Especially we must pay attention to the evils of Sabbath legislation, and the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. This is the battle-ground. Recently, at Minneapolis, a convention of fifteen thousand Christians, amid a storm of applause, passed a resolution for the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. These fifteen thousand Christians were the delegates of an organization with a membership of over one million. It purposes to hold a convention at New York next year with twenty-five thousand delegates present. At an international gathering of Congregational churches in London, England, last month, a resolution of the same tenor was passed unanimously. So it seems that English, French, and German Christians are trying to run our national affairs. It is bad enough for American Christians to undertake to exercise this ecclesiastical authority; but when foreign churches join in this matter it shows a most outrageous spirit of despotism. The German Catholics hav just issued a call for a convention in which not only religious but national lines are to be emphasized. One of the declared objects of this convention is the maintenance of "Christian schools." This means the destruction of our common schools.

The danger increases. We must come together. We must counsel. We must agitate. We must work.

I look forward to a splendid gathering at Portland. I look forward to great results. I expect to meet a thousand Liberal friends there—brave hearts and helpful hands.

Yours truly, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

CORNELIUS, ORE., Aug. 11, 1891.

C. BEAL, President Oregon State Secular Union, My Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your letter of August 2d, containing an invitation from the board of directors of the state Secular Union, to deliver the opening address before the annual congress to be held in Portland, Ore., October 3d, 4th, 5th.

I appreciate the honor conferred upon me, and accept with pleasure the invitation. Human rights are mighty things, and I recognize the good work projected and being accomplished by the Secular Union of the state of Oregon. The safeguard of the people is liberty. Thanking you for the honor conferred upon me, I am,

With respect, ASENATH W. COCHRAN.

CORNELIUS, ORE., Aug. 11, 1891.

C. BEAL, President Oregon State Secular Union, My Dear Sir: Your letter of August 2d is now before me. The invitation from the board of directors of the Oregon State Secular Union to furnish music for the annual congress to meet in Portland, Ore., October 3d, 4 h, 5th, is accepted, and I will to the best of my ability endeavor to furnish such music as will be entertaining and that will merit the good will of all.

I thank you for this kind recognition, and am, sirs,

Your obedient servant, ADELE COCHRAN.

PORT TOWNSEND, WASH., Aug. 12, 291.

MR. C. BEAL, Portland, Ore.: Your letter inviting me to address the Oregon State Secular Union next October received to day. The invitation will be accepted provided satisfactory arrangements can be made therefor.

I want to choose some subject that I can discourse upon at least forty-five minutes—I do not care how much longer.

Re suggestions for our next convention:

1. I really think our work will be incomplete without an address from the president. I felt the loss last year, and hav many times intended approaching you on this subject. If it were announced that the president's address would open the convention I am sure it would hav the effect of opening the congress with a large audience. The address could then be published in pamphlet form, and sent forth to do missionary work for the cause. I will take on myself the duty of having an advertisment of it inserted in every Liberal paper in the country.

2 I think again the business of the convention should not be deferred until after the lectures, etc. You know how few there were in attendance upon our last business meeting. The addresses should be but a secondary matter—a side issue that will keep up the enthusiasm of those present. If nobody else does, I certainly shall suggest that we transact all our business before the addresses, or at least before all the addresses are delivered.

3. Another important feature to be attended to is the report of the chairmen of the various committees—standing committees. So far as I know not a report was handed in.

4. We want emphatically to attend to decorating the hall appropriately. I think a good plan would be to appoint a committee, who, some time previous to the convention, would arrange appropriate mottoes, etc., etc. You remember last year not even the stars and stripes were to be seen on the platform. I've thought of several little plans to decorate the hall and think I will yet materialize them.

I may write you again at an early date.

Yours for Freethought, KATIE KEHM SMITH.

WHEN Kepler announced his three astronomical laws, they were received with condemnation by the spiritual authorities, not because of any error they were supposed to present or to contain, but partly because they gave support to the Copernican system, and partly because it was judged inexpedient to admit the prevalence of law of any kind as opposed to providential intervention. The world was regarded as the theater in which the divine will was daily displayed; it was considered derogatory to the majesty of God that that will should be fettered in any way. The power of the clergy was chiefly manifested in the influence they were alleged to possess in changing his arbitrary determinations. It was thus that they could abate the baleful action of comets, secure fine weather or rain, prevent eclipses, and, arresting the course of nature, work all manner of miracles; it was thus that the shadow had been made to go back on the dial, and the sun and the moon stopped in mid-career.—Professor Draper.

THE Bible statement, "God made man in his own image," is rightly reversed, and we say, "Man makes God in his own image," and it is true that "an honest God is the noblest work of man;" for, as man thinketh in his heart, so is he, and the conception each forms of the deity shows the highest capacity and aspiration of his own nature.—R. C. Adams.

Freethought in Maine.

A TRIBUTE TO JAMES Y. GRINDELL.

The little town of Blue Hill, on the sea-coast of Maine, is one of those quiet resorts that "the madding crowd" has not yet discovered, but which offers great attraction to the rest seeker who is satisfied with the quiet delights of sea and shore. Blue Hill rears its head a thousand feet above the little village, which nestles among smaller hills covered with groves, berry pastures, and rocky fields, with here and there a lot reclaimed for grass. An inclosed harbor a mile long, abounding in rocks more picturesque to the artistic eye than agreeable to the sailing skipper, leads to the outer bay where large islands make a shelter from the ocean swell. The bold outlines of the Mount Desert hills fill the eastern horizon and the Camden hills loom up in the west. Apart from the natural attractions that lend beauty to the drives are the various abandoned copper mines that excite admiration for human enterprise and pity for investors, while the mineral springs provide a refreshing tonic drink.

The town is guarded at either end by two sentinels, the Congregational and Baptist churches, which mark the settled limits and dominate the thought. All social life centers about the church and its meetings, except that the men from the neighboring granit quarries occasionally hav a dance in the little town hall or in a barn to which such of the ladies come as are not too pious or too aristocratic.

The influence of modern thought has made but little impression as yet upon the women, although the men begin to show signs of heresy and a few are outspoken in their Rationalism. One of these has lately accepted the sextonship of the Congregational church, at a salary of $30 a year—a sum that no Christian cared to work for. It is said that the minister decided the church needed to be swept, but upon his suggesting this performance, the sexton refused to do it and testily exclaimed, "Damn the church, I wish it was in hell!" He still holds the office, though, and rings the bell mightily for the various services. Another veteran made an unconventional remark to the minister, who was struggling to put up a screen-door on his house. The ungodly man came to the rescue and at once got the unruly door in its place. The grateful and good-natured parson said, "These ministers are of no account for such work." "No," was the bluff reply, "thar's a hell of a lot of 'em that ain't a damn bit of use."

Three years ago I gave the first and only Freethought lecture that was ever delivered here. The town clerk graciously let the town hall for the rental of fifteen cents, to pay for oil, and we had an audience of about sixty, the parsons and the elect having bulldozed the community into non-attendance, although the town clerk stood firm and refused to cancel the fifteen-cent lease at the minister's request. It was difficult to obtain a chairman, but finally one was found in the person of James Y. Grindell, an elderly man who for some years had borne the reputation of being liberal in his religious ideas. Further acquaintance proved him to be a clear-headed Freethinker who had quietly found his way out from his encircling creeds and embraced the ideas of natural religion. He afterward used to like to call for me with his valued gray mare and take me to drive, while he poured out his opinions upon the absurdity of the Bible miracles and the bad character of the Christian God. In his seventieth year he was attacked with a bronchial affection, and for some months he saw clearly that his end was approaching. It became a common topic of conversation with him and his mind dwelt much upon the religious ideas associated with such an event. He on every occasion boldly declared his dissent and in November last he peacefully passed away, conscious to the last, deliberately closing his eyes in death with his own hand.

Shortly before his death he told his wife that he had laid by some garments for his burial and directed her where to find them. The last night of his life a friend watched with him. He sent for his wife to sponge him and then said to her, "There is nothing more that can be done; go and lie down and rest." Soon after he said to his friend, "I'm most gone, ain't I?" "Yes," was replied, "I think you are." He then slowly and with effort moved his hands to his eyes, placed his fingers upon the closed lids, and quietly breathed his last. He gave orders that no minister should attend his funeral, but that the Freemasons should conduct the burial service. He said, "I suppose they will hav to use some sort of a prayer, but tell them to make it as short as possible." To the friends who conversed with him up to his last hour he repeatedly said that he had no fear of death and that he had no expectation of any life beyond the grave. His mind was clear to the last, and so long as his voice permitted he delighted to utter Rationalistic sentiments and instruct his friends as to the human origin of the Bible and the natural order of the universe. While he recognized the existence of an infinit force manifested in nature he denied any proof of the existence of a personal God. He was brought up as a Methodist and after leaving home became a Universalist. But he gradually broadened his views until he came to reject revelation and supernaturalism. Shortly before his death a relativ mentioned that his former Universalist minister was available to attend his funeral. Mr. Grindell had some years before expressed the desire that this man should officiate on that occasion, and it was hoped he might now accede to it. But he replied, "Mr. ——— is no more to me now than any other minister." The Baptist minister of the town called upon him. Mr. Grindell held out his hand to him and said: "Because we differ about doctrins there is no reason that we shouldn't be friends." The minister sat down, remained speechless for five minutes, when, with a formal compliment, he took his leave. He couldn't stand up to his theology in face of this dying Freethinker.

Everybody respected Mr. Grindell and only good words are said of him. His was the first funeral ever held here without the presence of a minister and it made a great impression. No one dares to apply the orthodox creed to this good man and many are asking themselvs if a creed can be true that damns such people, or that its professors are ashamed to stand up to in the face of the life and death of James Y. Grindell. He circulated a good deal of Freethought literature, and it was my pleasure to send him a large bundle occasionally, knowing that it would be well distributed. Many hav been influenced by his words and efforts, and Blue Hill will always retain the stimulus he gave toward a wider range of thought and a juster view of life. His faithful and intelligent wife carried out all his instructions, and we hav the record of the death and burial of an unbeliever free from superstition and unmarred by Christian calumny. Such a testimony has a greater local effect than any amount of wordy argument; for a good life and a peaceful death are generally believed to indicate the possession of honest principles, and, in spite of theologians, men accept the words of Pope, "He can't be wrong whose life is in the right." ROBERT C. ADAMS

A Visit to Nebraska.

I hav always been somewhat of a surprise to other people, but I am beginning to be a surprise to myself. Long ago when the Hutchinsons (a band of brothers from the old Granit State) used to sing of the Nebrascality I used to think of that place as so far removed from civilization that the rascality of trying to make it legal to hold slaves in the territory was something of less consequence than the returning of fugitivs from the then existing free states. A territory so far away could be held in abeyance. The thought of ever seeing it, or any part of it, was entirely out of all probability or even wish. But I hav seen some hundred miles of that state. And what is of still more importance to me (though the wonderful beauty of its landscape and the fertility of its soil would be of consequence to anyone wishing to settle in a comparativly new country) was the finding of many Freethinkers, some of them holding offices under government.

There came to my knowledge while in the state a case which perhaps it would be well for all of us woman suffragists to think about. A young man of respectability, well endowed by intellect and education for the position, received the nomination for school commissioner and superintendent of schools; he lost the election through the vote of the women because he was a Liberal. Now, we all know that if suffrage is right for man it is equally right for woman; and we, the old Garrisonians, were wont to say when told of the consequences of freeing slaves, "We are to do right though the heavens fall." Is not this giving suffrage to my own sex as difficult a subject to consider as freedom to four million slaves? Our government is constantly menaced by the usurped authority of the church. Shall we add to that authority by more than doubling that power? I confess myself at somewhat of a standstill. Born a believer in human rights, without regard to sex or color, I am more than anxious when I think of what may be the consequences of doing what is right. I do not wonder that Jesus of Nazareth when asked the question, "What is truth?" evaded the answer by going out. I am sure when the question is asked me, as it frequently is now, "Shall we vote for woman suffrage?" my answer is quite as irrelevant as was the going out of the Nazarene.

But I took my pen to write of my visit to Seward, Neb., and of some of the people I met there. Some twenty-seven years ago a Mr. Lewis Moffitt and wife went into that region, now Seward, bought of the government very many acres of land, put up a house of one room, and set about making a home and building a town. The hardships which they endured in the three or four years, more or less, while they were the only settled inhabitants of that region, having to travel seventy miles to procure all the necessities of life, encountering blizzards, etc., are hardly describable on paper. It is much easier and certainly more pleasant to write of the beautiful county—Seward county—and the city of twenty-five hundred inhabitants, laid out and named by its founder. Very many of its finest lots on which are built the public buildings were given to the city by Mr. Moffitt. Of course all these gifts added to the wealth of Mr. Moffitt and wife, for to make a city you must hav many inhabitants, and to call inhabitants you must make inducements. Mr. Moffitt now has a home which anyone might envy, no matter how fine his tastes or how heavy his pockets—four hundred acres, some of said acres covered with timber of nativ growth, oak and walnut; other acres of new growth; orchards of apple-trees in full bearing, and also many trees bearing the smaller fruits. I passed by four miles of hedge which fences a part of the farm. The dwelling is in the center of a yard one acre and a half in size, on which are one hundred evergreens of various kinds. To this beautiful home I went some weeks ago by invitation of the Moffitts (they bearing the expense of the trip), because although we had never met, they hav known me through THE TRUTH SEEKER in all the years I hav been accepted as its friend by its Editor. Added to my pleasurable visit with Mr. and Mrs. Moffitt, I made the acquaintance of a number of Freethinkers, some three of them outranking me in years to the number of ten. One man took the Boston Investigator when it was only a half-sheet printed on one side only—Mr. H. L. Boyes, eighty years of age, an energetic, earnest Liberal. It was worth a long journey to meet and exchange greeting with him. But I must close. The time is fast approaching when I must leave this place where I hav been made so very happy by my dear friends the De Lespinasses.

LUCY N COLMAN.

Orange City, Ia., Aug. 25, 1891.

Ho for the Portland Convention!

The time for the annual convention of the Oregon State Secular Union is rapidly drawing near. What are the Secularists on the coast doing or thinking concerning this convention? Portland, the metropolis of the Pacific northwest, the trade center and natural collecting and distributing point for the entire northwest portion of the United States, should be made the great intellectual and moral center for the same scope of country. All that is necessary to accomplish this is for all who are interested in the great work of reform to put their shoulder to the wheel, and at the next Secular convention giv a good strong lift, and thus start the car forward with an impetus which a continuation of effort on the part of those who really desire to see real reform can maintain until it shall hav played a most conspicuous and laudable part in the crisis which all with open eyes see just before us. I would propose, and would be glad if all interested would write to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Brother Beal on the subject, the convention be continued five or six days, and be systematized thus: One day to be occupied by the Infidel, one by the Spiritualist, one by the Adventist (or the Spiritualist and Adventist could divide one day between themselvs), one day by the labor movement advocates, and one by the woman suffragists, and one for general business. In that way it could be made a union of all the various movements on a Secular basis That is just what we want. If we can get the woman suffragists, labor agitators, Spiritualists, and the aggressiv reform movements in general to unite as Secularists, the days of religious legislation are numbered. Now a great many may not question the practicability of this plan and may wish the Union success, but go no further than wish. Wishes never made anything succeed. Work—persistent, earnest work—is the thing that counts. Brother Beal is working himself to death for the success of the cause; but one man cannot do it all. Who will help? Speak all at once if you wish. Let all who hav any desire for reform in any direction come to the convention determined to help all they can. Let all who can and will render any assistance between now and then address C. Beal, Cathlamet, Wash., or room 27 Labbe Building, Portland, Ore. HENRY ADDIS.

Another Letter from Mr. Heywood.

DEAR MR. MACDONALD: With other "good, easy reading," August 5th, the Tilton trinity brought me Karl Heirzen's "The Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations," translated by Mrs. Emma Schum, financially godfathered by Karl Schmemann, of Detroit, who writes a preface, and recently published by Benjamin R Tucker, Boston. I knew Mr. Heinzen well in 1860–61. also Dr. Marie E. Zakrzewska, a slight-built, physically delicate, but mentally vigorous woman referred to by Mr. Schmemann in his preface. In thought, speech, and physique Heinzen was a quiet athlete and no sham about him; hence I feel to resent unseemly haste hereabouts to rope his ghost into the Anarchist church in Boston. To Theodore Parker's society in 1861 I preached Anarchy as I still believe in it, viz, natural law and order, truth, justice, freedom fleshed in personalities, creativ enterprise, spiritual forces, supply and demand in material activity where all serve, "none command and none obey." In 1860 Stephen Pearl Andrews published the "Constitution of the Pantarchy," which, with "Science of Society" and his numerous other works, is the most exact, explicit, and complete formulation of Anarchy ever proclaimed. But the equivocal pretense of freedom here in Boston which types and mouths the noble word Anarchy is a fraud. As they claim to be "scientific Anarchists," we may take Mr. Tucker to illustrate their philosophy, teaching by example, may we not? When seven innocent men were under sentence of death for their opinions in Chicago in 1887, "X" (Henry Appleton) said in an editorial approved and published by Mr. Tucker in Liberty, that the Chicago Anarchists had "invaded life and property;" they had done no such thing; hence I wrote Mr. Tucker a brief note calling his attention to the falsehood he had published about the seven to be martyred men, but he refused to correct it! I published the correspondence between him and me in the Word at the time. When the future Walpole, seeking authentic record of events in these times, reads Mr. Tucker's columns about the Chicago Anarchists, he will hav to say, "As to this history, that's a lie." In June, 1890 Mr. Tucker published approvingly an editorial by Victor Yarros, entitled, "A Declaration of Independence," in which they, two alleged Anarchists, jointly and severally, agreed to silently acquiesce in the suppression of newspapers and imprisonment of editors and publishers by the Vice Society vermin of New York, Boston, and St. Louis, and they hav been a part of the great liberty-robbing majority ever since. To cap the climax of mercenary cowardice, Mr. Tucker has recently expurgated Zola's "Money," mutilated a French classic for fear of Comstock and for the money such mind-murdering servility to lewd despotism will fetch! Would that Boston could hav been spared this last disgrace inflicted on her by a pretended Anarchist.

The freedom, the sphere, of slaves is the circle described by their driver's lash. The dark dead-line drawn around the Liberty newspaper's office; the fierce-whirling ax of its grim executioner-in-chief; the pile of pates that hav tumbled from his editorial beheading-block into his waste-basket below (the editor of the Arena's head, B. O. Flower's face, being the last to look smilingly up from the bloody lot); "Be an Anarchist or die," the flag of freedom floating over this "free" business; a studied boycott on every advanced measure; the more citizens Comstock imprisons for their faith, the less he, Mr. Tucker, will hav to "regulate," and the face to call the newspaper exponent of this restrictiv outfit, "Liberty"—such is "philosophical" pretense, calling itself Anarchy. Some weeks ago, Mr. Tucker said: "It is my [his] right to sleep with different persons." Admitted, and regardless of sex. August 1st he termed "virginity, that paltry, tawdry, and over-rated gewgaw." When did he earn the right to "yawp" at the eye, the soul, of woman's personality in this rude style? When we consider the fact that virginity bespeaks elemental, inviolable choice, the sacred fact of feminin freedom, woman's inalienable right to hold or bestow her person as she deems best—Mr. Tucker's language, above quoted, is simply indecent bravado, scandalous presumption. His growing obtuseness of perception is painful. In December, 1875 in the Word office, with Charles F. Mason, a young Princetonian, Mr. Tucker was setting up "Cupid's Yokes"—I writing it with a pencil, and the two typos at my heels shouting "copy." Inadvertently I had used the word "lust" as opposed to love; Mr. Tucker called my attention to the fact that lust means vigor, exuberant power, which is not naturally dissolute. I accepted the correction, and the sentence stands to-day as then by him revised. The book has been revised and reset twice since, but none of the "obscenity" has been omitted. Most of the changes made in later years were suggested by Mrs. Heywood, the most intuitiv, relentless, creativ, and serviceable critic I ever encountered.

When the Boston vice lice in 1882 (Mrs. Heywood calls Henry Chase "that louse crawling over the body politic and dictating to us what books and newspapers we may publish"), when the obscenists suppressed "Leaves of Grass," and induced Oliver Stevens, the district attorney of Suffolk county, to threaten prosecution if the book was not expurgated, Whitman said, "No," and took the plates to Philadelphia. We reprinted as "The Word Extra" two of the "worst" (best) poems, without note or comment, deeming that the most effectiv way to resent the outrage and vindicate the nobly natural book. I was prosecuted but acquitted. Mr. Tucker advertised the whole book for sale by himself personally, defied Comstock, Chase, Stevens—the world of vice worms. They slunk back into their nativ mud. But now said worms hav so far repressed and got him under that he mutilates and expurgates books for "business purposes." From 1872, when I first met him in Elliott Hall and he subscribed for the Word, till 1884 he was a clear-eyed, resolute, irresistible exponent of freedom of conscience, speech, and the press. But now, alas! What was Adam's fall compared with Tucker's fall? But in giving Proudhon to the English-speaking world and in battling for mental liberty in years past he has done imperishable, immortal work for human progress.

Carlyle said, "Democracy is Anarchy plus the constable;" rather let us see that Democracy is Anarchy transcending the constable. Anarchy is true, but cowards and hypocrits do not illustrate it. The idea that persons silent under the lewd, rude despotism that now rules these states, should presume to think themselvs Anarchists! Louis Blanc said: "A curse on him who is not enough an honest man and enough a man of courage to be capable of the crime of hospitality toward a proscribed person." Charles Sumner said: "Liberty of speech is the very breath of a republic, the press a terror to wrong-doers." Shall we allow the wrong-doers, foul tyrannists, to benight reason and conscience?

Thanks to Mrs. Schum, Mr. Schmemann, and Mr. Tucker I am privileged to read Heinzen's remarkable book, and hav ordered a special copy which I shall present to the mother of my children, the woman with whom I hav had the honor to share a home twenty-six years. Will write you about the book more at length later. EZRA H. HEYWOOD.

The Survival of the Unfittest.

Victoria Claflin Woodhull Martin at the recent session in London of the International Congress of Hygiene and Demography read an elaborate essay on the "Rapid Multiplication of the Unfit." She took an advanced position and her paper was much discussed.

Some of her propositions follow:

One of the most fruitful sources of error is the supposition or taking for granted that others will see and comprehend human nature as we see and comprehend it. An individual sees and comprehends a social problem from his or her understanding. He or she has longings, desires, emotions, and sensations, and he or she imagins that others hav the same sensations, that they will respond to the same stimuli in exactly the same manner and with the same degree of intensity in a given circumstance, in a definit social order.

There are often greater differences between individuals of the same race than between individuals of different races. Some are more richly endowed, with more highly evolved nervous systems. If we wish to understand the basis of a superior faculty we study how the nervous system of the individual has become specialized. In the same way if we wish to understand the inferiority of individuals we study in what way their nervous systems are defectiv. It is this differentiation of the nervous system which separates man from man more than even geographical isolation in our modern civilization. The period of reaction to tactual, to auditory, to visual sensations depends upon the physiological condition of the central nervous system.

FATIGUE POISON.

It is said that in a new country where the land has not yet been appropriated, there is no such thing as the unemployed or the pauper. When colonists first settle upon a piece of land there is plenty of outdoor exercise, manly pursuits, work which does not cause physical deterioration. But after a time, as population increases and sedentary occupations take the place of activ pursuits, crowded inclosed workrooms take the place of work in the open air, the energy of the workers is gradually sapped by artificial life in cities, and they become the progenitors of a class physically enfeebled, spiritless, incapable of sustained effort.

Power of endurance in individuals is not equal; so that we could not say that eight hours' work or that less or more is beneficial to all alike, for one may work eight hours continuously and not be exhausted whereas another may be totally exhausted in six. Physicians warn us that if we do not allow sufficient rest to a tired organ to recuperate, waste products accumulate, producing poisons which are a fruitful source of disease. The most activ agent in generating the unfit is fatigue poison. If a large percentage of histories of family degeneration can be traced in the offspring of parents who hav passed the prime of life, how much larger must the percentage of family degeneration be due to physical exhaustion from overwork or the lack of sufficient light and fresh air.

MARRIAGES OF THE UNFIT.

But in any attempt to raise the standard of humanity, to aid evolution, we must take into consideration that it is not the survival of the fittest, but the survival of the unfit, by means of their rapid multiplication in societies as presently organized.

Any cause which determins the mating of the individuals has a direct influence on the quality of the human race. All artificial social inducements for the mating of unsuitable individuals are instruments for the multiplication of the unfit. To prove how detrimental our present social life is on the human race we hav only to ask, How many of the marriages would be consummated which take place if there were no social inducements, no fear of public opinion, no regard for the law, if there were no other inducement but the fact that he is male and she female, and that they are physiologically mated? How many who to-day are not mated would under such a state come together, and how many who to-day propagate from other inducements than love would not do so? One great cause of the rapid multiplication of the unfit over the fit is our false social system, which places so many obstacles to prevent the coming together of our best men and women.

How many opportunities has a girl to find her physiological mate in her little set—even if she were free to choose? Sexual selection has very little scope in our conventional system.

FOOD AND REPRODUCTION.

Among other causes which conduce to the rapid multiplication of the unfit, it has been suggested that the reason why the poor are so prolific is that they are underfed, that abundance of rich food lessens fertility. From experiments on flowering and fruit plants, by checking the nutritiv conditions of the plant the reproductiv power is increased; the roots of fruit trees are cut in order that they may yield abundant fruit. Darwin has already mentioned the subject in his work on animals and plants under domestication. He says: "This strange doctrin has apparently risen from individual animals when supplied with an inordinate quantity of food, and from plants of many kinds when grown on excessivly rich soil, as on a dunghill, becoming steril."

Opposed to this theory is the statement that population increases with the increase of food—that is, the number of animals increases rapidly where food is plentiful, and in times of dearth and scarcity the number decreases. The increase is ascribed to the increase in the number of marriages in prosperous periods. But among the very rich, where the increase is most rapid, I do not think this increase is due to the legal marriage. It is very difficult to reconcile the naturalist's and the political economist's theories. Other checks may be at work which tend to obscure the value of the first theory; it may be that the food supply, falling below the minimum necessary to sustain life in a healthy condition, causes diseases or otherwise incapacitates human beings in the struggle against adverse conditions in an industrial crisis.

THE REMEDY.

The best minds of to-day hav accepted the fact that if superior people are desired they must be bred; and if imbecils, criminals, paupers, and otherwise unfit are undesirable citizens they must not be bred.

The first principles of the breeder's art are to weed out the inferior animals, to avoid conditions which giv a tendency to reversion, and then to bring together superior animals under the most favorable conditions. We can produce numerous modifications of structure by careful selection of different animals, and there is no reason why, if society were differently organized, we should not be able to modify and improve the human species to the same extent. In order to do this we must make a religion of the procreativ principle. Our girls and boys must be taught how sacred is the life-giving principle—the most wonderful of all the forces at work throughout nature.

Our young men and women should realize the purpose for which they are uniting in the holiest bond of physical life. And by this means we would hav inaugurated the upper million and the lower ten. Any social conditions which tend to transpose these terms are subversiv of the true interests of humanity.

VICTORIA CLAFLIN WOODHULL MARTIN.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL will lecture at Du Bois, Pa., Sept. 10th and 11th, and in Pittsburgh on the 13th; at Massilon, O., the 20th.

THE Lucifer Club, composed of the subscribers to Lucifer and friends of Moses Harman, will hold a convention at Ottawa, Kan., on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of September. There is much enthusiasm among the members of this club, and arrangements hav been made for a large gathering. Voltairine de Cleyre and other well-known speakers will attend.

W. F. JAMIESON was arranging with Mr. George T. Bruce, of California, for a series of debates with the doughty champion of Campbellism, Rev. Dr. Driver, but the reverend cannot be coaxed into debate, although he makes the Christians believe he is dying to get hold of an Infidel. Mr Jamieson now says he will accept calls for lectures and debates anywhere. Address Box 366, Des Moines, Ia.

S. P. PUTNAM'S lecture appointments for September and October are as follows: Jamestown, N. D., September 5th, 6th; Boseman, Mont., 8th, 9th; Colville, Wash., 12th, 13th; Spangle, Wash., 15th; Rosalia, Wash., 16th, 17th; Oakesdale, Wash., 18th; Palouse City, Wash., 19th, 20th; Pasco, Wash., 22d, 23d; Nanaimo, B. C., 26th; Wellington, B.C., 27th, 28th; Snohomish, Wash., 30th; Portland convention, October 3d, 4th, 5th; Grant's Pass, 7th, 8th; San Francisco, 11th. Will lecture in California through the months of October, November, December, and January, state convention January 29th.

The Nuns in the Schools.

[We printed in the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER previous to this the news that the Catholic authorities of Texas propose to fill the public schools with nuns as teachers, and the opinion of the assistant attorney-general which will allow them to do it, providing they can wield sufficient pull with the county superintendents and trustees of the schools. Below we print a protest against the scheme by a Protestant preacher, the Rev. George Rose, of San Antonio, eliminating some of his pious catch-phrases, and confining him to secular sense. His sermon shows that even though their opposition to the scheme comes largely through their hatred of a neighbor sect, the Protestants will condemn this movement. And it is said that when thieves fall out honest men get their dues.]

Recently in this city at a normal school there were seventy-seven applicants for certificates to teach in the public schools of this state, forty-one of which were sisters of charity. This is a matter of intended significance, and worthy at this time of our best attention and consideration.

The purpose of the creation of public schools is that the youth of our population should not grow up in ignorance purely as to secular knowledge, and so be unprepared to win their way in the battle of mundane existence. Wisely we hav no church and state joined in this country. The United States has always held that there must be no sort of coercion in religious matters.

The church of Rome, as is well known in Roman Catholic countries or anywhere else, is neither pioneer nor champion of secular education. It is at least a remarkable coincidence that where in countries and parts of countries the Roman church is strongest there is the reverse of sound progress, cultivated intelligence, and general learning. Witness Ireland, Spain, portions of Italy, Mexico, and the Central and South American states. Taking these countries as examples, we hav reason to think that the Roman church not only has not heretofore fostered the liberal education of the masses, but has positivly discouraged it. The unfavorable comparison to the general advancement of the people of the Roman Catholic states mentioned, and Protestant America, England, Scotland, and the British colonial possessions, we need not hesitate to ascribe to the different policies pursued in the respectiv divisions of Roman Catholic and Protestant nations in the matter of secular education.

Tens of thousands of Protestants at one time believed it was right and proper to open the exercises of our public schools by the reading of the scriptures. But they hav been made to see, by one argument and another, that religious education is not part of the curriculum of the public school.

Now, if for any reason the King James version of the Bible has been closed in the public school, is Pope Clement VIII.'s version to be opened? If so, may we Protestants ask why? The answer is, and our Roman Catholic brethren, dealing with us in all candor, will admit it, the church of Rome will not accede to the secularity of public school education in America, at least as to their own people. It will not tolerate where it can prevent it what it calls "the graceless education of the public schools." Therefore Roman Catholics everywhere in the United States hav been making, are making, and will continue to make, efforts to introduce their religion in the public schools.

There need not then be the slightest doubt on the part of anybody as to the reason why sisters of charity hav taken out certificates to teach in the public schools of Texas. The sisters, estimable women that they are, owe first allegiance to their church, and if they become teachers in the schools, according to the organization of the church of Rome, it were vain to think that they would not still remain completely under the direction and control of their church authority while drawing public money for their support. Let them or their superiors explicitly deny this if they will. Rest assured it will not be denied in unmistakable terms. The introduction of sisters of charity in the public schools of the United States is the entering wedge, and it plainly means this—the alliance of church and state in these free United States, and the ultimate control of public education here in the interests of the church of Rome.

Are the Roman Catholics taxed for the support of the public schools? So, likewise, are Protestants, Jews, and others who are too in the majority. Is there unfair discrimination in any way against the children of Roman Catholics in the matter of public instruction? This is not claimed. The fact is, all are treated alike. Then where is the right and justice of Roman Catholics seeking and pushing for an advantage not accorded to other denominations in the particular under consideration? Would it be becoming and just on the part of people whose interests and rights are at stake to remain silent at this juncture of affairs when violence is being done to precedent, custom, and to one of the greatest institutions of this free land? Certainly not. We should be unworthy of the name Americans if we did not at this time sound the note of alarm to bring people together to consider and take action in the premises.

Who is it that has raised this question in our neighborhood? Who is it responsible for the disturbance of the religious peace of the community? True, we might remain quiet and offer no opposition while our schools were being handed over to Roman Catholic influence and direction; but the matter would prove costly in the extreme, in the end. So now is the time to giv the warning that public money must not be employed to support any denomination in connection with our public schools. Others do not ask it, and Roman Catholics must not get it. It is the duty of all alike to be tolerant of religious difference or opinion. We do not tax Roman Catholics for Protestant religious instruction in the public schools and they must not tax us for the payment of their teaching.

What may we expect in the practical work of having the sisters in the public schools? They will most likely be sent to small places where they will hav absolute control. At first one sister will be sent to a town or settlement, and as the community grows, another sister will follow, and later a third, until the schools are filled with them and to the exclusion of teachers of other creeds. Parents then will hav no choice as to the instruction of their children; they must either send them where the sisters are instructors or keep them at home. Now, will Protestants and Jews like this, to be compelled to accept the education of their children at the hands of a religious order under the authority of the Roman Catholic clergy, or to provide other instruction for them at separate and often large cost, or to let them grow up in ignorance? Which alternativ will they accept?

But we are told that the sisters will not teach religion in the public schools, and that if they did they would be liable to expulsion. But with the public school as a basis for operation what is to prevent the sisters from teaching their scholars anything they please outside of the school, with which instruction we shall be told we Protestants and others hav nothing to do? Let us not deceive ourselvs in this matter. The sisters—if not directly then indirectly—by their very presence, manner, dress, and in ways beyond number, can and would familiarize the minds of the youths, and instil into them, Roman Catholic—as opposed to other religious—ideas, peculiarities, and teachings. This may be set down with absolute certainty. The Roman church does not bother itself about questions of the importance of the one we are considering, without motivs. And the motivs in this case, as has been said before, are to supply, and at public cost, Roman Catholic religious instruction openly or otherwise in the public schools. And this I contend is a matter of the very gravest concern to Americans. And I here say Americans advisedly, for the reason the effort to control the education of children in the United States has its origin outside of this country and among foreigners.

Again, there is on the political economy side of of this question weighty reasons why religionists should not supplant secularists as teachers in the public schools. After long preparation and much cost a class of worthies hav equipped themselvs as instructors in the institutions we are thinking of, and with the understanding that the study and imparting of religious knowledge was to be no part of their duty. Now suddenly in one department of the labor market it is proposed to introduce to the number of forty-one out of seventy-seven applicants a class of laborers whose ostensible business is work of charity, and who are receiving maintenance and support for such work, not only from their own church, but from many other sources. Now is this right, to force into an already congested labor market a class of laborers comparativly independent of the wage to be paid as a means of livelihood? The Roman church, as is well known, has large revenues and extensiv and well-furnished quarters for its defendants, and why then this anomaly of a church that professes studious regard of the interests of labor, of crowding upon the labor market, to its vast unsettling and disturbance, a class of laborers already provided for? What is to become of the laborers already there, or preparing to go there, with a clear understanding between them and the state as to the exact requirements of the service, namely, calling for no teaching by object-lesson or otherwise of religious matters?

We hav looked at the subject on the religious, moral, and economic sides, now let us take up the political phase of the question. Who is responsible for having introduced into Texas politics the subject of at least religious influence, if not instruction, as will be contended, in the public schools? Certainly not Protestants; they hav not demanded and do not seek any advantage for themselvs over their neighbors in that matter. On the contrary, they see the necessity for and demanded the complete separation of religious and secular education, when the state pays the bills. And now are we to go to the polls and vote whether or not women wearing the especial dress of a religious order, marking them distinctly as to who and what they are, shall be permitted to teach in the public schools? I trust not. I hope the Roman Catholic church authorities will wisely refrain from pressing this question, which is sure to arouse distrust and opposition in a marked degree. Americans hav said everywhere and at all times religious questions must be kept out of politics, and they hav served notice to this effect whenever the question has come up in the past, and will continue to serve such notice whenever it arises in the future.

What the Young Freethinkers Need.

In the article "How to Make Freethinkers of the Young," Miss Craddock suggests that there should be a Freethought paper for the young people. Something of the kind is certainly needed for the benefit of those who are a little too old to take an interest in the "Children's Corner," and feel as if they had been told to "listen and not talk" when they read the able articles written by the veterans in the cause, who express their ideas much better than they could hope to. These young people are "scarcely noticed" in any of the Freethought papers, yet they are at the period in life when to openly express Liberal sentiments entails the most hardships, and should receive the most encouragement. The young man who, at the beginning of a business or social career, allows it to be known that he is a Freethinker, handicaps himself greatly." If he depends on others for employment many will not employ him, not because they doubt his ability or honesty, but because it would not be "politic to hav an avowed Freethinker in their establishment. If he sets up in business for himself, by opposing the church he resigns the patronage of most church-members. He will not receive any encouragement from those who believe as he does, but whom "policy" bids be silent; they will listen to his public defense of his belief without the least sign of approbation and perhaps say to themselvs as they walk away, "Sensible talk that, but very indiscreet in the young man." This young man will be avoided socially, his intimates will be nearly all men and then only in a business or "out with the boys" sense. The result of all this is that the young man is apt to change his residence and suppress his opinions.

Later on when his financial position is assured he may again avow his Liberal sentiments, or he may deem it necessary to remain a hypocrit all his life. I hav a sincere admiration for the young woman who dares to openly oppose the church. She has so little to encourage her. She injures herself socially, and society means everything to most young women. The "average young man" will consider her "strong-minded" because she has formed an opinion on a subject he has never thought of, and a "strong-minded woman" is a "terror" to the average young man. This is the condition of the young Freethinker in the towns and smaller cities, but is not so severe in the larger ones. This country is growing more liberal year by year, and the time is not far distant when it will be no hardship to be a Freethinker. In the mean time let something be done to encourage the young Freethinker. Show him that some one takes an interest in him. You who are employers, when you want a clerk or a mechanic, advertise in the Freethought papers, if you can employ some young Liberal, and encourage him in fearless speaking. Would not that be better than to hav him fall into the hands of some double faced deacon, where he would learn hypocrisy and deceit? You need not take him if he is not competent or cannot giv reference. A paper devoted to the young people would do much to encourage them. It should not be the opposit of a Sunday-school paper, or be otherwise childish. It should contain a large "Children's Corner," but on the whole be a paper for young men and women. It must be made attractiv. The knock-down arguments and satirical writings of the Freethought papers are not read by the young, there are so many other things more interesting. I hav no fault to find with any Freethought paper; they answer perfectly the purpose for which they were intended; but they are not adapted to the minds of young people.

The "naked truth," a "simple statement of facts," and "arguments without frills," are all right, but it is better to clothe the truth in even a fanciful dress and hav it received, than not to hav it received at all. A simple statement of facts with illustrations is an improvement, and it would be better to put a double row of frills around every argument, if by so doing people would be interested enough to read them. While it is absolutely necessary that such a paper should be anti-religious, it should also be scientific and literary. It would be a medium through which the young people could get acquainted, compare experiences, and receive advice; not in the way it is usually administered, as a medicin, but in the shape of the actual experiences, with comments, of those who hav "gone before." I think the success of such a paper is assured. Every Freethinker would take it for his children, and it would be of such a character that even the "old folks" could not do without it.

New Publications.

M. Myerovitch, of 205 Jackson street, Nashville, Tenn., has printed a pamphlet to prove his new theory that "the origin of the polar motion is the repulsiv power of molecules."

The Maine Coast Cottager takes the place of the Mt. Desert Herald, published at Bar Harbor, Me. It is edited by Joseph Wood and devoted to building up the interests of the Maine coast.

The Freethinkers of India hav begun the publication of a paper, fortnightly, called Modern Thought. It is printed at Bombay, and we sincerely trust that it may survive longer than its predecessors.

A lecture by Professor W. J. Woolsey, entitled, "The Churches and the Pews," can be had free by addressing Dr. Wilson, 258 Nash street, St. Paul, Minn. It is a Liberal speech, and levels some keen shafts against orthodoxy.

"What's Bred in the Bone" is the novel, by Grant Allen, which took the five thousand-dollar prize awarded by London Tid Bits; republished here by B. R. Tucker. As a novel it is very fine and holds the reader's attention closely. Price 35 cents.

"Miss Worden's Hero," by H. B. Salisbury, is a Socialistic-Anarchistic forecast of the "coming revolution" in this city, told in novel form. It is published by G. W. Dillingham in very cheap style, and few we imagin will care to pay even 25 cents for it.

Professor C. L. Haskell, St. Louis, Mo., has printed in tract form an article which he recently wrote for these columns, on "How to Convert Atheists." It is No. 1 of "Do-You-Ever-Think Series." He would probably sell a dozen for 25 cents, and their distribution would do good.

Thomas A. Davies has written a pamphlet, "Am I Jew or Gentile? Or the Genealogy of Jesus Christ, Proving His Divinity," which may be had of E. H. Coffin, 49 John street, New York, for 25 cents. The work is a new twist of "holy writ," and it is unnecessary to say that the claim made in the title is untrue.

"Vacation Time, with Hints on Summer Living," by H. S. Drayton (Fowler & Wells Co.), for 25 cents, contains a good deal of good sense and considerable of the usual nonsense talked by "hygienists." But as on the whole it makes for out-door living and plentiful exercise its influence is good, though there is no special reason why it should be called Vacation Time.

Perhaps every admirer of Charles Bradlaugh already possesses George Jacob Holyoake's story of his "Life and Career," as printed by Mr. Green, but if he has not he should get it. It is an affectionately just tribute to a really great man. Those who read it will know Bradlaugh better, and some seemingly harsh actions will be explained by the knowledge. Price, 15 cents.

Peter Eckler is always publishing valuable works, and his latest, printed in his usual elegant manner, is "John Calvin, and the Errors of Presbyterianism." The publication is the result of a correspondence between Mr. James Bell, of Brooklyn, and a Calvinistic preacher of Detroit. An authentic portrait of Calvin discloses why his system of theology is the worst of all Protestant speculations. His "errors, ignorance, misconceptions, and absurdities are disclosed and exposed." The book is exceedingly useful to the scholar and the price is $1.

Freetraders will naturally desire to hav Henry George's latest volume, "Protection or Free Trade?" and probably the reader with limited means and time can get no better book on the subject. Mr George claims to hav answered every question raised by the protectionist and met every objection to free interchange of commodities between nations. This may or not be so, but Mr. George is an able writer, and undoubtedly his book will be of use to those who think there is no prosperity for the country until the custom-houses are abolished. Price, 25 cents.

Paul Carus, of the Open Court, has issued a second edition of "Fundamental Problems," price $1 50. The purpose of the book Mr. Carus explains thus: "The fashionable Freethought of to-day is so closely connected with negativism and hedonism that most people are accustomed to identify Freethought with these its excrescences. In this book, however, is proposed a philosophy of most radical Freethought, that is no negativism, no Agnosticism, and no metaphysical mysticism, but a systematic arrangement of positiv facts. On the ground of positiv facts, it equally opposes hedonism as well as asceticism, propounding a humanitarian ethics which, if obeyed, will keep our nation healthy and must lead us not on the easy path of 'least resistance,' but on the thorny and steep road of progress onward and upward to ever higher and nobler states of existence."

"Freethought Readings and Secular Songs," is a compilation by J. M. Wheeler, one of England's most industrious Freethought writers. The title describes it and we can only add that the selections are judiciously and critically made. The authors from which the poems are chosen include Bruno, Saxe, Swinburne, W. R. Alger, Edgar Fawcett, James Thomson, Leigh Hunt, M. J. Savage, Susan H. Wixon, W. B. Scott, Margaret Fuller, Shakspere, Thomas Hood, Frank Felt, George E. Macdonald, Shelley, Britton, Ernest Jones, and others. The children of Freethinkers can find in it many good pieces for school recitations. Price, 50 cents.

Anyone interested in Russia will find "Russian Traits and Terrors," published by B. R. Tucker (price, 35 cents), a revelation surprising in the extreme. Russia is about the worst country in the world if we may believe the writers of this work. The people are all liars, slothful, dishonest, immoral, and cruel. The half has not been told about their prisons; their persecutions of the Jews exceed the published facts, and the peasantry are in a worse condition than were our African slaves. The book was originally published in a series of articles in the Fortnightly Review. If the charges against the country are true, and there is too much ground to apprehend they are, it is well the world should know it.

B. R. Tucker has published Karl Heinzen's "The Rights of Women, and the Sexual Relations—An Address to an Unknown Lady Reader." It is a very radical work, calculated to shock most people, but full of facts and common-sense conclusions—as such works usually are. Its perusal would make a good many men ashamed of themselvs, and likewise some women. Of it the Boston Beacon says: "The volume contains, from the nature of its theme, a great deal of plain speaking, but there is nothing in it that ought to offend a serious mind; and it is interesting to observe that the opinions of the latest scientific investigators into the subject of the evolution of marriage are in agreement with Heinzen's suggestions." Cloth covers, $1; paper, 50 cents.

One of the curiously useless books which people persist in writing is Wm. Hemstreet's "Mind in Matter; or, The Substance of the Soul," printed by the Fowler & Wells Co. Mr. Hemstreet claims soul to be a thing, and just as material as the body is, whether electrical or ethereal; and that mind is the innate quality of that thing like cohesion or energy in matter, although in neither case can we tell the why or wherefore. He argues that by demonstrating the corporeal nature of the soul we demonstrate its immortality, in the imperishability of matter and its alliance with volitional tenacity of love of life. He suggests this theory will add a new system of social philosophy and explain and support existing theology. The book sells for $1.

The "Agnostic Island" is a story by F. J. Gould of the efforts of some missionaries to convert to Christianity the inhabitants of an island in the Australasian regions who had no religion, but guided their lives by a code of principles known as Agnosticism. It is an unusually well-told story and has been accorded praise in all quarters. "Original in conception, the story is told with such unaffected simplicity—every character is so natural—that the reader is unconsciously entranced, and is impelled to pursue the narrativ to the end. It may safely be asserted that no orthodox Christian could rise from a perusal of the work without having his mind liberalized and his intellectual capacities widened. 'The Agnostic Island' is just the book to put into the hands of a liberal Christian anxious to understand and appreciate the faith of the maligned heretic." Price in this country, $1.

"The Dawning," by J. M. L. Babcock, has entered upon its third edition. It ought to be its thirtieth, for it is a book that is full of rare thought and suggestion. It is a romance of love and labor, where what is noblest in both is beautifully sketched. "The Dawning" is one of the novels of the new age. It was written for the head and heart of man, and appeals to both with equal power. The story is fascinating, the characters charming, and the advanced questions of the day are treated in a way that commands respect and influences opinion. The author of this rare book has put the world of thinking men and women in his debt. His broad sympathies for his race and his earnest purpose in seeking to ameliorate the hard lot of the working class, make "The Dawning" a book that all wage-earners, as well as all students of the industrial problem, should read. Paper, 50 cents.

"Leaves from a Conjurer's Scrap-Book; or, Modern Magicians and their Work." Donohue, Henneberry & Co., is a handsomely printed, neatly bound, and fairly illustrated book of nearly 300 pages from the pen of H. J. Burlingame. The author is a bright and entertaining writer whose literary work in this particular field has been much sought after by the press of Chicago, he having traveled professionally over the greater part of this country and Europe. As he was a success in that capacity he has since become an acknowledged authority on the prestidigitator's art. The book runs through several chapters of gossipy reminiscence relativ to celebrities of this profession past and present. Many astounding tricks are laid bare by the illustrations. The basis of all religions is the love for the mysterious in humanity, but what appears mysterious on the platform is often ludicrously absurd when explained by an adept. Anyone desiring to familiarize themselvs with professional deceptions or illusions, such as the decapitation, cremation, or the palanquin acts, would do well to purchase this book. It sells for $2.

"Main-Traveled Roads" is a series of "six Mississippi valley stories" by Hamlin Garland, published by the Arena. Price 50 cents in paper and $1 in cloth. The publishers thus describe the work: "All the stories are distinctly American. They deal with the light and shadows of Western life. Mr. Garland nowhere preaches or moralizes, but every story, by its wonderful picture of life and conditions as they are found to-day, tells a vital truth and stimulates thought. It is with the people, the great army of toilers who struggle so heroically and receive so little of life's comforts, that the author deals in this remarkable volume. The title is by no means misleading. It is over the main-traveled road that the characters pass, some bearing heavy burdens, some bowed with age, care, and trouble; some laughing in the exuberance of youth and radiant in the wealth of health and hope." The novel is a work of genius and calculated to stir up trouble if read by the hard-working farmers of the South and West. The Farmers' Alliance could use it effectivly as a campaign document.

"A Little Book for Men and Women About Life and Death," by W. Carew Hazlitt, price $1, has reached us from Reeves & Turner, London. Mr. Hazlitt strongly opposes the church, and he sums the purport of his book in this way: "A survey of the whole question convinces one: 1. That we and the other tenants of the earth are parcel of a colossal system of which our knowledge is exceedingly defectiv, and of which, under clerical auspices, we should hav remained to the last, not merely in absolute ignorance, but with altogether false impressions. 2. That while the church was, during a certain length of time, a wholesome agent in the promotion of literature and the arts, it at no period helped forward real education, and is, under changed circumstances, the greatest enemy to human progress and welfare. 3. That as the church has been constructed by ordinary human methods, it is as open to criticism and inquiry as any other branch of our political fabric. 4. That so long as the church continues to exercise its authority over our schools and training, the progress of real culture among other than independent thinkers is out of the question; and 5. That, in order to place the views of the community on a solid and sincere basis, the entire scheme of teaching in all our seminaries, for girls as well as for boys, for advanced pupils as well as for the very young, must be absolutely secularized."

James M. Logan, W. A. Wagner, J. Monroe, M. Fleming, Sam Luse, John A. Calder, J. Warmbrod, George W. Meyer, A. W. Beery, W. G. Troutman, D. Hepler, and D. W. C. Priest. Such help as these gentlemen extend we gratefully appreciate. We desire to greatly increase our list this fall and winter—in fact, it is imperativ that we should do so—and ask our friends all over the country to help us. The list could easily be doubled if only one-third of our readers would take as much interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER'S success as the gentlemen named above.

WE will furnish free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. A Freethinker of good address, man or woman, out of work, could make good salary selling this book in any town of fairly Liberal inhabitants.

Concentration of Effort.

The issue of the San Francisco Freethought of August 15th was its last. The following card by the Board of Directors of the Freethought Publishing Company explains why:

"After a careful consideration of the resources at hand it is decided that Freethought shall be consolidated with THE TRUTH SEEKER. The present pecuniary support of Freethought does not justify its continuance as an independent journal, with the burden resting upon a few. Much has been accomplished by the generous devotion of friends, and that which has been accomplished will form the basis of new effort. It is not a retreat but a change and combination of forces whereby at the least outlay the greatest results can be attained.

"We hav not the wealth and power of the churches. We hav to work with small means, and we must make the best of these means.

"Fortunately we are not without allies able and willing to aid in the advancement of the Liberalism of the Pacific Coast. THE TRUTH SEEKER hereafter will take the place of Freethought. It is hoped that the subscribers of Freethought will heartily support this alliance, and approve the wisdom of the course adopted.

"Whatever advance subscriptions hav been paid for Freethought will be made good by THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"THE TRUTH SEEKER will hav a special department devoted to the work upon the Pacific Coast. S. P. Putnam will contribute 'News and Notes' from all parts of the field. There will be weekly correspondence from San Francisco and other points, and ample reports of conventions and Liberal meetings, and in every respect the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER will, like Freethought, giv account of the progress of affairs and maintain the spirit of fellowship. Thus, through THE TRUTH SEEKER we can keep up communication with one another, hold our ranks intact, carry on the work with advantage, and preserve unity of action, the objects for which Freethought was established.

"A great work has been done. We view it with pride and hope, and are satisfied that under the new arrangement it will still be successful and glorious.

"We are poor, and because we are poor we must be economical of our expenditure. We must make a dollar go as far as we can, and coöperation is the word. But not the less do we labor with enthusiasm, not the less do we see the promis of the future, not the less do we believe in the victory of our cause.

"We feel sure that the readers of Freethought will coöperate in this movement, will giv it their generous support, and thus make the Liberal work more effectiv and broader than ever. We must combine There is an immense effort throughout the country for a union of church and state. We cannot haul down our flag; from East to West there must be a solid array of Liberals. We cannot afford to waste our powder. In view of the pressure of the times, the uncertainty of the business world, and the danger that confronts us, concentration and consolidation are necessary to the Liberal cause.

"The headquarters of the Freethought Publishing Company will be at San Francisco, as heretofore, for publishing, printing, sale of Liberal and scientific works, etc.; also the special agency of The Truth Seeker Company to receive subscriptions and renewals of the paper, and sell books. By means of this branch office the country between the East and the West will be constantly activ.

"We are convinced that when the benefits of the consolidation of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Freethought are thoroughly understood, it will be welcomed by friends and supporters with the greatest enthusiasm.

Continuing, Mr. Putnam says to the Liberals of California and the Coast:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work of Freethought. It is impossible to do double duty. I must confine myself to the lecture field. The labor there is of the first importance. I shall be in California during the months of October, November, December, and January. I desire to address Liberals wherever possible, and arrange for a grand convention at San Francisco, January 29th, Paine's anniversary, of the California State Liberal Union. I hope that all will coöperate. We must not giv up because our means are small. We can and must do something. There are formidable issues presented to us. The people must be educated by the platform as well as by the press. Arrange for one lecture at least if no more. Even if only a few attend this is infinitly better than nothing. There will be advance. Minds will be awakened. With the union of Freethought and THE TRUTH SEEKER, I shall hav opportunity for greater work in the field. The Pacific coast is my home, and here I wish to devote myself to the interests of the cause. Rally to the flag, and let us hav a splendid fall and winter campaign worthy the memory of Thomas Paine. Send the word along the line. I shall expect a general response. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM."

Mr. F. L. Browne, who, since George E. Macdonald retired from Freethought, because he couldn't stand the strain, has had charge of the office editorial duties, supplements the foregoing with a statement. Mr. Browne is an old friend, and was a clerk in this office when D. M. Bennett was in the flesh:

"I reflect regretfully upon the departure of Freethought for the East. I would that I were going with it, even away from the sunny skies and balmy breezes of the Pacific coast; away to the storm and chill of the Eastern winters.

"Although my work has, until recently, been behind the scenes, I hav taken an activ part in the publication of the paper almost from the very start. I hav burnt the midnight oil in its behalf many a time and hav put forth my best efforts to help make it a success.

"Therefore I say adieu sadly. I see it and its interests depart eastward as those of a dear friend whom I may expect never to meet again.

"The force of circumstances dictates this course. It is wiser to make a safe harbor than to attempt to weather a storm outside the shelter. It is better for the interests of all that the work should be shaped to continue than to court disaster by an attempt to do too much. Our good commander-in-chief givs, in another column, detail of arrangements made for the best interests of all concerned. It is unnecessary for me to repeat them here. Do not for a moment think that this move is made for the purpose of lightening the burden upon the shoulders of those activly engaged in the work connected with Freethought. The move cuts off the income while it still leaves a burden of financial obligations upon the management.

"In our work we hav been nobly supported. In times of need we hav not looked in vain for the response to appeals for assistance. This is fully appreciated. This has encouraged us to continue the work in the face of appalling difficulties. But we are tired at last. We feel that it is better to let others assume a part of the burden.

"Born and bred in the Liberal ranks, it is out of the question for me to drop the work. It must go on. I shall continue to watch the progress of Liberalism on the Pacific coast; shall compile the items of interest and see them published. To this end I invite correspondence from the many personal friends of Freethought. I shall hav opportunity to become acquainted with you and exchange ideas. Let us work together. Local Freethought societies, send me reports of what is happening in your organizations; Freethinkers, call my attention to items of interest in the field of Liberalism; personal friends, write me of new thoughts which come to you. We can make this work move on with greater effect than ever, if you will all do this.

"Over the paths of gleaming steel that span the continent shall speed the messages proclaiming life, activity, and effectivness in the Liberal ranks heretofore represented by Freethought. Friends, here is my hand and greeting."

These statements are sufficient, perhaps, but we must say a few words to the Liberals of the country, and also extend the hand of family fellowship to the new friends who hav come to us from Freethought, to whom we introduce THE TRUTH SEEKER this week.

The past two years hav been hard ones for the few journals upholding the cause of Freethought. There has been much to distract the mind to other issues. Business has been poor, merchants finding but few customers, while the farmers hav been compelled to sell their crops for little or nothing. There has been no great case of persecution by the church to draw the Liberals together, and some of them hav felt that things are going all right—that the church is losing its grip upon its members and ministers; that the rumored trials for heresy boded the downfall of superstition, and that the creeds when revised would line up with common sense. Under these conditions the efforts of the Liberals hav relaxed, with unfortunate results. Charles Watts, one of the ablest men who ever stepped upon a platform, has found it necessary to go back to England, where he could better provide for his family, and though his work in Canada is to be continued, we very much fear that it will not be possible to hold the Liberal people of that country together as he has done. Freethought, with two of the ablest men in the country at work for it, has found the path too rough. The task its publication imposed they hav found beyond their strength.

One of them has been compelled to look elsewhere for the means to support his family, and the other thought it best to lay the burden down that he might do more to help the cause from the lecture platform. There is no one to blame for all this; it is simply a phase which all unpopular causes must show at times. We hope that the results will hav the effect of arousing the Liberals to a sense of the situation.

The consolidation of Freethought with THE TRUTH SEEKER, however, is not by any means a weakening in the work. On the contrary it is an expansion, and will help the Pacific Coast friends to do still more, as THE TRUTH SEEKER is larger in circulation and affords greater opportunity for correspondence. We ask its new readers to take it to their hearts as they did Freethought, and we hope to make it the same welcome friend to their firesides. Whatever is peculiar to the Coast will not be omitted. Mr. Putnam will find ample room in its big pages for his "News and Notes;" he will be its lecturing Editor and traveling representativ. Mr. F. L. Browne will send us each week full accounts of all that touches the interests of Liberalism on the Western slope—from the Sierras to the Sea—and the Liberals of California, Oregon, and Washington will find it as devoted to their work as was Freethought. The office of the Freethought Company in San Francisco—838 Howard street—will be a special agency where Liberals visiting the city can find the paper and our books, and leave their subscriptions as well as at the Eastern office. We shall make good all the subscriptions paid in advance to Freethought, but we also ask those who are behind to forward the money due as soon as possible. We strongly desire to keep on our list every name on Freethought's list, and by taking advantage of our terms for clubs THE TRUTH SEEKER will cost them little if any more than did Freethought. And to every one of these new friends we extend a hearty invitation to write to us, tell us of their work and wants, and so keep up the cordial spirit of fellowship developed through Freethought.

Prayer and Rackarock Powder.

When the theologians want or don't want anything, they pray. They pray to avert famin and ring church bells to keep off a plague. If there are too many grasshoppers around they pray that the Lord will kill the insects, and a man dying from a bullet wound is made the victim of the same incantation.

It used to be considered one of the minister's duties to pray for rain when a dry spell continued too long, and so foolish were some of the minister's parishioners that they objected to his praying for rain till they had gotten their hay in. The others, having gotten the hay in, insisted that the preacher should go ahead.

The difference between the theologians and the scientists is clearly shown in this question of rain. Theology believes and supplicates; science reasons and experiments. The theological method of getting moisture from the skies not proving a success in rainless localities, science has taken up the matter, and triumphed over theology. Hereafter prayers for rain will be at a discount, and the minister has lost another hold on his victims. This account, from Midland, Texas, of Science's triumph was in nearly all of the daily papers the other day:

"The labors of the rainmakers whom Uncle Jerry Rusk sent down here to try to pump water out of cloudless skies are practically at an end so far as this particular locality is concerned.

"General Dyrenfurth will leave for Washington to-morrow morning, to be gone about ten days. He is highly pleased with the success of the experiments and has perfect faith that the power of making rain has been secured.

"From a barren, dry alkali prairie this country has been transformed into a first-class pasture land.

"The ranch belongs to Nelson Morris, of Chicago, and covers three hundred thousand acres. Before the rain persuaders came there had been no good rain on the ranch for three years—only light showers at rare intervals which did but little good. Since the experiments were begun there has been one tremendous rainfall, and there has hardly been a day without a shower or two. The grass is getting green.

"The experiments hav not yet been conducted upon the extensiv scale of the program first laid out by General Dyrenfurth, but sufficient has been done to demonstrate that the right plan for making rain when it is needed has been discovered.

"The balloons, owing to the present inadequate means of making oxygen in large quantities, hav not been a dazzling success. But the rackarock powder and dynamite hav worked wonders with the atmosphere.

"The explosion of any large amount of dynamite and rackarock was followed by rain inside of ten hours upon eight or ten occasions.

"Last evening was the final and most conclusiv and satisfactory of any of the experiments. The night was clear and there was every indication of a long dry spell.

"Five balloons were sent up and exploded. A stiff gale was blowing from the east and they drifted far toward the setting sun before they exploded. The battle on the ground where rackarock and dynamite took the place of heavy artillery lasted from 6 o'clock until 10, then the general and his forces retired. They were awakened at 3 A.M. by a vivid flash of lightning, followed by a violent clap of thunder. They went out and saw a storm of great violence raging in the west. It rained until about 8 A.M. Then many pounds of dynamite and rackarock were exploded again. After each discharge the rain fell in torrents."

We do not know whether it is humiliating to the Lord or to his preachers to hav to acknowledge that dynamite and rackarock powder are more powerful than they, but the case seems clear. It is well known that prayers for rain were not always followed by showers, and that shrewd preachers put off their supplications till the wind was in the east. What follows? The conclusion is inevitable that God couldn't or wouldn't make it rain when the conditions were not right.. Now, if he couldn't, then dynamite and rackarock powder are more powerful than he, for they force the conditions and the rain follows. But if he could but wouldn't, then his chosen mouthpieces were of no more avail with him than other folks. Preachers are useless, their prayers are not answered, the Lord heareth them not. Then what in the world is the use of supporting them? False medicin men should be set to work. Let the ministers stop praying and to go experimenting with dynamite and rackarock powder. So can they earn their salaries and become of some benefit to the world.

Another Jewish Convert.

The Jews are at last, under the persistent prodding of Mr. Benjamin, warring toward the Christian mission for their conversion in a manner which must speedily render Mr. Freshman's enterprise unremunerativ. And his converts, under the able tutelage of Mr. Benjamin—who hates a Christian Hebrew with great ability and zeal—will all soon be induced to sit with the faithful of Israel again, leaving a net result of nothing as a basis for begging for funds to support the Hebrew-Christian mission in St. Mark's place.

A Hungarian Jew, by name Max Winterling, is the latest renegade from Judaism to Christianity, and also the other way. His story is found in the following affidavit:

"City and County of New York, ss.

"I, Max Winterling, being duly sworn, say that I reside at 17 St. Mark's place in the city of New York. I was born in Budapest, in 1868. I arrived in New York in 1886. Here in a strange land, with no friends, I drifted until I heard of the existence of the Rev. Jacob Freshman and his mission, at whose mission Jews in my position are assisted and maintained in consideration of giving up their religion, Judaism. I became a frequent visitor at Mr. Freshman's, and as I never received a thorough Jewish education I soon fell a prey to the convincing proofs of Christianity as depicted by Mr. Freshman and his aids. I was duly baptized by him on January 15, 1889. He assisted me during my stay in New York until I was sent by him to a seminary at Mt. Hermon, Mass., where I remained for one school year and then returned to this city. During my vacation I was again supported by Mr. Freshman with five dollars weekly and free lodging. Here my eyes became opened to the peculiar irregularities and inconsistency of both Mr. Freshman and my fellow-converts. I became cognizant that while the converts pretend Christian piety in the church, they scoff and laugh at Christianity in general, and Mr. Freshman's ignorance in particular, outside of the church. The few old Bible proofs in favor of the New Testament became to me ambiguous and obscure. When I presented my difficulties to Mr. Freshman, his sole reply was that I must not permit the devil to get the best of me. Finally my conscientious struggle became unbearable I now resolved to cheat Christianity and myself no longer. I therefore make an open confession before God and men that I never was a Christian at heart and could never be one especially when my Christianity should emanate from men like Mr. Freshman. He himself might be a good Christian, but his huge ignorance and inconsistency never did and never will influence any conscientious and enlightened person to follow his example. I am also free to say that every convert which Mr. Freshman ever made is of the same opinion as myself but they lack the moral courage to express themselvs openly. As I was the one who called the police officer to eject Mr. Benjamin when he together with the Herald representativ visited the reading-room, it will be seen that it is not at the instigation of Mr. Benjamin that I come to my conclusion. I certainly owe an apology to the Christian community for cheating them out of their money and good will. The only restitution I can offer is by warning them against a further waste of money upon the other converts. The Christians who honestly lend a helping hand toward maintaining the Hebrew-Christian church are innocently committing the crime of promoting and encouraging dishonesty among converts like myself.

"MAX WINTERLING.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this tenth day of August, 1891. Wm. J. Becker, Notary Public City and County of New York.

Having gotten this evidence against Mr. Freshman's mission Mr. Benjamin has gotten Mr. Winterling out of the country before he turns himself over again. The real Jews regard such fellows with scorn and aversion, and use them only to help break up the mission. The American Hebrew says of them: "We beg our Christian friends to dismiss from their minds any idea they may entertain that we feel gratified at the renunciation of Christianity of men like Winterling. We prefer they kept out of our faith. We hav no use for men like Winterling, Hoffman, et al., who will use religion as a cloak for obtaining an easy livelihood; no more use than we hav for Mr. Freshman, who knows the character of the material he employs to urge religious and well-meaning Christians to part with their money, under the idea that they are really saving the souls of Jews, when they are only helping to support a lot of worthless persons, most of whom would be in jail if they got half their deserts." There is none more clannish in religion or zealous and jealous for his faith than a Jew, and the attempt of the Christians to convert poor people of that faith arouses as great a religious hatred as exists between Catholics and Protestants. And it can be truly said of the Jews that very few yield to the pleadings of the Christians, and they are of the most dishonest kind, willing to play the hypocrit for the sake of a few dollars. Mr. Winterling says that five other converts made by Mr. Freshman "will withdraw the mask of conversion so soon as their domestic affairs and financial difficulties are straightened out." It may be thought that such might be safely left to their own destruction, and they probably would be did not the Christians find them available as excuses to beg money and did not the Jews dislike to see even the most worthless of their number renounce his religion.

Editorial Notes.

SOME of the Freethinkers of England, led by G. J. Holyoake and H. L. Brækstad, hav begun a movement to repeal the law which now makes it illegal to leave property in trust for Freethought purposes, and which sanctions confiscation of money avowedly bequeathed for the advocacy of views hostil to Christianity. A general election will probably take place in England within a year, and candidates for the next Parliament will be supported or opposed as they favor or oppose such action. Mr. G. W. Foote, as president of the National Secular Society, concurs in the effort, and will render what assistance is in his power. The National Reformer says of the movement: "It has of late years grown more and more clear to most Freethinkers that the future success of our movement, as one of persistent propaganda, depends on its being properly endowed. But endowed it can never be, however anxious Freethinkers may be to leave their money to it, while the present wicked blasphemy laws subsist in their entirety. These laws must be repealed, in part ere long, in whole ultimately. When Mr. Bradlaugh last introduced his bill for their repeal, it was resisted by men like Mr. Samuel Smith and Sir Edward Clarke, on the score that the repeal would allow blasphemous cartoons and writings to be published with impunity. Mr. Samuel Smith's snuffle about the honor of God Almighty is a thing to remember. These precious champions of the honor of omnipotence hav not dared to attempt a single blasphemy prosecution since that of the Freethinker; yet they maintain the law against endowment on the pretext in question. But the bill now in hand does not ask the bigots to surrender their power of imprisoning us for attacking their opinions; it only proposes that bequests for the endowment of our propaganda be made legal. They will be left free to prosecute us for blasphemies, if they dare. If, then, they insist on preventing us from endowing our movements as all other movements are endowed, they will stand confessed as simple brigands. No honest Christian can for a moment defend the policy which taunts Freethinkers with lacking institutions, while deliberately confiscating all funds left to found such institutions. The time is come to put Christian morality in this matter to a decisiv test; and to that end it is incumbent on all British Freethinkers to support the new bill by every means in their power."

Letters from Friends.

Practices What He Preaches.

IPAVA, ILL., July 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which send to another new convert, the new subscriber named at Astoria, Ill. It requires time and reason only to light the whole world. What was once a simple spark has grown to a gigantic blaze that will soon drive out all darkness. And the sooner every true Liberal will, in kindness and confidence, advocate the principles of Liberality, the necessity of universal justice, the sooner we will hav universal light. Yours truly, C. S. RANDOLPH.

Make the Holy Day a National Holiday.

ST. ELMO, TENN., Aug. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I want the Congress of the United States to pass an act making the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, a national holiday, in which everyone in the United States can be just as free to do or act as on any other national holiday. No one has any right to do wrong on any day, and everyone ought to be just as free to do what is right on Sunday as on any other day, and whatever is right to do Wednesday or Monday cannot possibly be wrong on Sunday. Giv us a national weekly holiday. Then some people can grunt and groan, whoop and howl, and be as blue and dismal as they choose, without compelling everybody else to be blue and dismal also. L. L GOODWIN.

Freethinkers Must Work as Earnestly as Christians

FITCHBURG, MASS., Aug 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I asked some of the news-dealers here if they kept your paper, but they said, No! This is a great city for God-houses, and they are running full blast every night and all day Sunday. There are two of them about eighty yards from where I liv, one on each side of the street. I often think, if Freethinkers would only work half as earnestly how much better it would be for the cause. A friend and I tried to start a club in Waltham last summer, but failed. The most of them were too weak-kneed, and afraid of the Christians and of losing their job, although there are enough who profess to be Freethinkers to make a good start. I may say that Heston's cartoons are simply great. Wishing you success and long life to battle for the right, I remain,

Yours for the truth. DANIEL MCCLURE.

Lost in a Wilderness of Superstitionists.

RICHMOND, Aug. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: There are in this village three churches, and a one-horse printing-press run by the church. What makes me say one-horse, sectarian, is that I hav tried it and found it dare not publish anything that was Liberal or that the church objected to. I wrote a piece entitled "Church vs. Sunday-school." Its scene was back in 1850. I described the best I could the society then and now. I gave it to the printer. He came out with a long editorial giving me fits, and of course I replied, and he would not publish my reply.

That you may succeed in all of your lawful undertakings is my sincere wish.

I am here alone, as it were, as far as Infidels are concerned. There is not a number of THE TRUTH SEEKER taken in this part of the county, and I do not know of one being taken in the county. If I was able to get some smart lecturer here to talk to the people it might make a big difference in the minds of the people. But a smart talker cannot afford to lecture for nothing. I would be willing to pay for half of the expense if I could get some one to meet the other half

A Freethought Book for Norwegians.

SIOUX FALLS, DAK., July 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received your circular letter. I see you hav about as hard pecking in New York to make a living as we hav here in "the wild and wooly West." But we hav a magnificent crop of oats and wheat. The farmers are now busy harvesting. So we keep courage up, and hope to find some clover after harvest. In the last week I hav raked in the magnificent sum of two silver dollars printed on paper, for books sold, but a friend of mine lugged off my TRUTH SEEKER picture-book, and my little girl must hav another, so here goes the silver to please THE TRUTH SEEKER, myself, and my little girl.

I shall also mention, I hav just got out another small book, 112 pages. Its title is, "Evolution in Heaven and Earth." It is a new story of creation, from the standpoint of Freethought and science. The book is built up from extracts from such men as Flammarion, Proctor, Denton, Haeckel, Wakeman, and many others. It is written, as before, in the Norwegian language. The price is 30 cents, four for $1. Those who hav read it so far giv it a good name. N. S. JOHNSON.

LONGSTREET, GA., Aug. 2, 291.

MR. EDITOR: Take the two articles of P. F. Shumaker and J. L Tompkins in the August 1st number; answer them according to Dr. J. B. Dodds, that "Electricity is the primal substance in nature, out of which all things in being were made;" giv it eternal existence and intelligence, will, and power, which we know it has; imagin its omnipresence and intimate connection with mind; place it behind phenomena and all that is, and then see if we cannot get along without any Gods or devils or beliefs in the supernatural. Postulating electricity, by further studying, investigating, and experimenting for another million years or so, we come to agree upon the most consistent of all ideas of God, Pantheism (electricity). It is a little clearer than mud, then, that if we look for eternal substance, we hav it in electricity. If power, we hav it in electricity. If omniscience and omnipresence, what like electricity? If goodness and love, we do not look for that in any God (so called) nor in nature either. Goodness and evil are very much mixed, according to our experience, and we expect always to find it so in time to come. Electro-psychological science must and will, I think, classify and explain the "phenomena," and show how and why they are in exact harmony with nature's order. Yours for truth, T. N. MASON.

Why Are We Against the Bible?

Aug. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In the number of April 25th Mr. W. L Willis promised us another article about Spiritology. I am desirous to come into intercourse with ghosts. I think a real medium need not fear investigation.

Why are you so against the Bible? For four years I had religious instruction and learned verses from it, and the reading of the Bible did me more good than all the teaching of the consistoriabrath. Without it the farmers would all come in the same category with the captain under Frederick the Great who said on hearing of Roman law, "My goodness! I thought it was everywhere as in Prussia!" The patriarchs, David, Solomon, were noble characters for their time. Invested with sovereign power, we should admire their moderation. Æsthiages, Nero, Caligula, Henry VIII., Prince Pierre Napoleon, Emperor William, were more violent and bad. Queen Esther and Queen Herodia were not worse than Marie of Medicis and Anne Boleyn, who killed Admiral Coligny and Thomas More. Ruth followed the advice of her mother-in-law and the custom of the country; she cannot be blamed. Styles are different all over the world. Cleopatra, in tender negligée, wrapped in a blanket, had herself carried by a slave into the tent of Cæsar. Mary of Burgundy met Emperor Maximilian in the street and kneeling down said, "How I longed for you, you young blood!" When Caroline of Brunswick went to London she had to wait for the royal carriages, and George IV. and his mistress insulted her. You remember certainly the reception given to Alexandra of Wales when she landed in England. A CONSTANT READER.

A Suggestion.

DES MOINES, IA., Aug. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to see a review of Fiske's "Idea of God" in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Or if this work has been specifically reviewed by some competent writer heretofore, will you advise me, so I can avail myself of it?

By the way, is this suggestion of any value either to truth-seeking or Freethought? Is it practical? Get one or more Freethinkers in each locality to make a list of all known Freethinkers in that neighborhood, and forward it to THE TRUTH SEEKER or the Secular Union, for the purpose of reaching this class of persons on proper occasions. The list should be frequently revised and kept in order by states and counties and cities. I am led to think that there are thousands of Freethinkers who do not even know of a Freethought paper. As a class, these persons do not care to make much demonstration; they silently enjoy their own opinions, and let everybody else "think as they please." Any attempted organization of this class will be apt to prove a failure. At least, this is my opinion and observation. But if this class were simply "known" to each other, it would be of use. And it seems to me it would be well to try to lead up to a proper recognition of Freethinkers as such in future statistics. We hav tables of church-membership in government statistics; why not membership of Freethinkers? But this is not so important, perhaps, as to "know each other here." I hav tried to get some of the friends to list our folks in Iowa, but hav not yet succeeded. I think it would be a good plan for THE TRUTH SEEKER to undertake this work, and that it would be financially profitable to it and useful to the cause. J. J. DAVIS.

BOND, KAN., Aug. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of the 8th of August you print an article in reply to Mr. Swartz which I must say was mortifying for me to see printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER—an article that one could only expect to see in a paper whose object was to destroy liberty and enslave thought by the most direct route, by destruction of a free press and an untrammeled tongue. Your article in question is so vindictiv and reckless in regard to the facts in the case that it has no place in a paper whose purpose it is to guard the cause of freedom and justice. Whenever you set out to defend such legislation as the law which has got its clutches on Mr. Swartz and attempt to justify it, you are preparing a catch-basin into which you will sooner or later fall yourself unless the tide of the pious meddling is turned. While I would not contribute to the support of the Sun for this reason, it is not the kind of literature which interests me and I cannot see that humanity would lose any valuable support if the Sun were suppressed, yet all people are not of the same way of thinking as I am, and I do not see how I can say that society in the shape of the state of Kansas can say that it has a natural right to prohibit the sale of the next issue of the Sun, TRUTH SEEKER, Christian Advocate, World, or any other paper, the contents of which has not been made known. If the libel laws are not sufficient to protect the people, then make haste to remedy them, but do not jump up and say you hav a right to forecast the future and make it a felony to circulate a publication of which you know nothing. You ask Mr. Swartz if he investigated the papers he sold to see if they contained the truth, and at the same time make use of a quotation you did not investigate to verify. If you did investigate you shot wide of the mark. The quotation is: "Whoever sells it does so under cover of secresy." This I know to be not a fact, for I hav seen with my own eyes the news-boys sell the paper in question, or rather offer it for sale, which amounts to the same, and I hav also heard his gentle voice break the stillness of the Sunday morning with the cry, "Sunday Sun here!" and that on Kansas soil and within fifteen or twenty minutes' ride from Kansas City. You charge the Sun with only printing names in full when the victim is weak and defenseless, and when the victim is likely to avail himself of the libel laws to use various ways of cunning to evade them. I wish to ask, Do you know this to be a fact? And do you know the various other charges you make to be true? If so, why do you take the precaution to locate your victim without using any name except the weak and defenseless Mr. Swartz? I write not because I think Mr. Swartz incapable to defend himself, but because such articles as yours should not go unrebuked.

Yours for liberty, F. O. HELLSTROM.

One View of That Kansas Paper.

DENVER, COL., Aug. 10, 116.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to Mr. Swartz's case for selling the Kansas City Sunday Sun, I wish to inform your readers that Mr. Swartz is not guilty of any wrong, as the Sunday Sun is just as proper a paper to sell or read as THE TRUTH SEEKER or any other paper, notwithstanding the scurrilous abuse of the Sun by "Senator," of Rockport, Mo. The Sunday Sun is a religious paper devoted to exposing the cussedness of Christians, and as the clergy and senators and other rulers are the most lecherously wicked, why, of course they were oftenest the objects of the Sun's scathing roasts. I hav read almost every issue of the Sun, as hav thousands of the best and most moral and refined people in Missouri and Kansas. The trouble with those like the Rockport "Senator" is, they are thoroughly bad and make a specialty of seducing innocent young girls and flirting with other men's wives, and of course they think any paper is very bad and obscene that dares expose their vile and crooked doings. All of the large daily papers of the country publish the same sensational stuff that the Sun does. If the Sun was only careful not to roast the rulers, but confine its rays to the poor working people, it would be a very nice paper and we would never hear of the clergy and senators going in the legislature and asking for laws to suppress a paper that has the courage to expose their immoralities. Every person who is moral and does right has no fear of the Sunday Sun, and will not be injured by its teachings. Yours for truth and justice,

DR. C. W. MCCORMIK.

Reasons for Hard Money.

SALIDA, COL., Aug. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: There has been much said of late through your columns upon the question of money. Has our specie any intrinsic value? Many deny that it has. Which we claim is very erroneous, from the fact that every dollar of gold or silver taken from mother earth costs in the aggregate two dollars. Peoples and nations must hav a circulating medium, or money exchange, and that must rest upon a value, before as well as after a government has indorsed it. Gold and silver from earliest history hav been obtained through hard labor, and naturally adjusted to the conditions and requirements in the trade and commerce of the world. Other substitutes hav been passed for a time, but hav always proved disastrous. The Continental money of 1776 failed; the greenbacks at one time fell more than fifty per cent. Had the Southern Confederacy backed her paper upon gold or silver it would always hav been good for its face, except the coining expense. Money made from rags or other valueless material (valueless because it costs nothing to acquire it) cannot become solid or lasting, because it has no basis, no reality. It comes without labor. It is superficial to act as your correspondent suggests, that government should issue $6,000,000,000 of paper money, promising to pay A or B value received. I would ask what it would be paid in. Would it be paid in soap, molasses, or corn starch? Probably in tin cans or more rags. It would simply be a promis to pay, without any design to pay. A government can only giv currency to value or fail in the end. Governments must deal upon the same principles as individuals, or in time go to the wall. H. MURRAY.

HOWICK, QUEBEC, July 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: May I hav a little room in our esteemed TRUTH SEEKER for a few remarks on Mr. P. F. Shumaker's letter in the last TRUTH SEEKER? I hav often noticed that Mr. Shumaker is a good reasoner on social questions, but I call him a total failure in the solution of scientific problems. He certainly makes bad work of the science of electricity. In his first answer to Mr. Bell's questions on souls he says, "The soul is everywhere and can come from anywhere." To the third question he says, "The soul is composed of electricity." Electricity is not everywhere and cannot come from anywhere. Electricity is an effect caused by two different materials, one having the power of attracting and the other of repelling. When those two materials are in proper position and temperature they cause an effect.

It is true that blood is very electric from the fact that it contains much of the materials that make electricity. But why electricity should constitute a soul in a man any more than it does in an inferior animal, in a telegraph line, or in the clouds, I cannot see. Electricity outside of a man has never given any signs of intelligence, so I presume a telegraph line and the clouds hav no soul. Mr. Shumaker's answers are all ridiculous enough to draw a broad smile from anyone not completely unbalanced by the desire of an immortal something. But the best part of the farce is in the last part of his post scriptum, viz., "It is said that Dr. Franklin bottled electricity and corked it up." And he uses this statement as evidence that electricity can be dissociated from matter (after telling us that electricity was invisible and imponderable). How did some one (Dr. Franklin never said it) know that electricity was in the bottle? This must hav made many electricians smile, but I hardly believe it converted any to Spiritualism.

If I understand the sum of Mr. Shumaker's answers, it means that the human body is an electric battery and the soul is the electricity generated by this battery. This idea, viewed superficially, seems quite consistent, but it is too shallow to seriously engage a philosopher. Mr. Shumaker admits that the volume and quality of electricity (soul) produced is in proportion to the size and health of the battery (body); that a child has not as much soul as an adult; that mental defect produces a correspondingly imperfect soul and a weak body produces a weak soul. This seems to me like a perfect description of a soul that dies out entirely when the body does. Yet Mr. Shumaker, being a Spiritualist, must be describing an immortal soul. Perhaps he means that electricity is forever activ. In that case no Materialist will contradict him. After the death of man all the substance of his body returns to the big bulk of similar matter, and the electric part of him will again produce electricity, but it will do so in common with the big bulk; and supposing that electricity was the substance that composes God and all the other immortal spirits, as inferable from Mr. Shumaker's letter, the main battery or the bulk of electricity would certainly make quite a respectable God. It even has the principal characteristic of the only deity that we know of—its law is inexorable; it never stops to caution an innocent fellow to get out of the way but knocks down anybody that stands in its way, right or wrong and regardless of consequences. But how this main battery is going to maintain a separate little current of electricity (a soul) in good working order for each individual that ever lived for an eternity after each and every one of those little batteries has been dissolved and the material poured back into the main battery, is more than I can comprehend. CHAS. LAPERCHE.

A New Voice Heard in the Freethought Circle.

GRANT PASS, ORE., Aug. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Being a constant reader of your valuable paper and not seeing any letters from this part of the country, I thought I would write you a few lines. I hav been taking your papers for two years, and after I read them giv them away and am always careful to place them where they will do the most good. I sent you July 1st the names of new subscribers, and hope to be able in the future to send you many more, for your paper is doing more to drive superstition from the land than any paper that I know of.

Grant Pass has a population of fifteen hundred inhabitants; has five churches, all well patronized. There are some outspoken Infidels and some tender-footed ones. I was brought up to believe that the Bible was the word of God, and was told that it was wrong to doubt. When I was young I thought the Christian doctrin was true because so many believed it. But as I got older and began to think for myself and use reason instead of blind faith, common sense would not allow me to accept the Christian faith. I am now fifty years old, and hav always been a close observer and tried to solve mysteries and not to be humbugged or deceived by any others. A man that believes that a God that was able to design and create the universe in six short days and could not giv a better account of it than we get in the Bible; a man or woman that believes the story of the creation, or the story of the flood, or Samson's fox story, or Jonah's fish story, or the immaculate conception story, and a thousand of other stories just as absurd that we find recorded in the Bible—I say, any man or woman that honestly believes these stories ought to be pitied more than blamed.

I would like to see the Freethinkers organized in every state in the Union. I would like to see the reins of our government in the hands of Liberal men. I would like to see Harrison and Wanamaker go home and take charge of their Sunday-school classes; they are better fitted for that than they are for the positions they now occupy. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER and all its patrons all the success in the world, I remain, Your brother Infidel, JOHN G. ABBOTT.

LEXINGTON, KY., Aug. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: If the mind was an entity, how strange would be its shape and whole appearance to the eye of reason; its faculties and powers as slow coming to an agreement as the "peace of Ryswick;" the conscience not being ready-made; imperfect as it is,

A blush remains where virtue sets
To show that sunshine has been there.

The ruling passion is the gospel of every individual or century, and poor human nature struggles in chains of appe tite or sensitiv pity, or to die like some restless saint for the world or the world's applause, or to obey the terrible will of a murderess like Mrs. Gilmer, who murdered her husband to marry another man.

Society falls back upon its original constitution, weary of a struggle with vice, and plunges headlong into a mire of infamous luxury. This is what the world is doing now. The modern saint parades a mockery of a little kindliness in public, while the shameful lie and barbarous neglect and cruelty are inflicted upon the helpless poor in secret. Our father's house is a den of thieves. The church is a flimsy juggernaut kept up at an enormous expense in proportion to the little good done.

The churches dread the revival of old abuses and quarrels, and are disposed to cling together lest their organizations should topple down. If you want the truth published, so that the Augean stables of vice can be cleansed, disease and rottenness eradicated, apply to a fearless Infidel paper. They are not apt to lick the boots of power.

What reforming literature hav the Catholics? What bold writers and critics do they encourage and pay? Their geniuses are frozen in Michael Angelo's marble. Their Bibles are on the upper shelf next the wall, with Manning's anathemas, Gibbons's emphasized platitudes, in green and gold in front.

A shoal of Catholic missionaries are just upon us. What for? For fear that the emigrant might stray from the fold. The poor are not wanted. Do these foreign priests wish to liberate lands or reclaim them on the borders of civilization for their members? No, they prefer to dwell apart with their own languages, clergy, and peculiar regulations. Will they be Americans, with their pious old follies and fulminations?

Society will be bound hand and foot as long as possible. How will it be done? Fling a blinding vail over his common sense, make the monster believe that he is just on the edge of a precipice, a yawning gulf, a deep abyss, a future state, a hell, while the prelate or preacher is the bell-wether who can ring one into heaven, even if it is sometimes a tight queeze.

In benevolent institutions the inmates should suggest the rules which they obey, and be ruled no longer by female tyrants, Christians, who drive the helpless women into the sleet to work or force them to obey some foolish Sabbath law.

Hav these whited sepulchers said anything of land to be snatched from the hands of those who do nothing for the public good? Let them close their eyes and mutter their prayers, like angels, while the poor are suffering.

Mr. Blackburn has caused Mr. Ingalls to lecture at the famous Chautauqua, whose paternal ideas of government would suit the days of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, or some country where even now the husband will wring the necks of children to let the mother know that he is master. Some of his enlightened hearers remarked that they believed in the survival of the fittest; so did I, when I saw a dog chew up a ground mole.

Another great luminary is Archdeacon Farrar, who has a high opinion of a God, "whose presence is fullness of joy," and you know the rest, which he calls the sublime politics of God. Some theory which would include the fullness of decency and equal rights, would better suit the present period. ALHAZA.

Let Us Exhibit at the Fair.

BALTIMORE, MD., Aug. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Since you published my letter, I hav expected to hear from some Liberals in the country who would be willing to express their views on the question I asked them to answer—that is, concerning the advisability of erecting a building in Chicago for the World's Fair in 1893. As soon as I returned to the city from my vacation I questioned several of my Liberal friends about this novel idea, and all expressed their desire to contribute at least $5 each toward such enterprise if it were started. I myself, although my means are not far-reaching, would willingly giv a $5 note, and if necessary in the end a little more. The time we are losing on this plan, or rather, the time that is lost awaiting answers is valuable and every day counts. We would hav just about twenty months for work before us until the opening of the World's Fair, and if strong and able efforts are made during the next ten months to raise a fund, I think we could get a neat little sum. Now, a few words to our friends: Atheists, Agnosts, and all Liberals in general, come all to join this enterprise; let all hatred and ill-feeling among the different organizations be forgotten; try each and every one to contribute some pennies or dollars, whatever you may deem proper, toward the fund, for everything helps. Remember how well, how nobly, and how bravely the defenders of Freethought and science stood and worked to lay the first solid foundation of the path of Freethought. Remember the terrible and brutal punishments they had to undergo for expressing their honest views. Remember that when trying to lead the people away from superstition and ignorance, at the very beginning of their noble and self-sacrificing work, they were thrown into dungeons, and then brought to the public squares of towns and either burnt or lashed. Should we not, for these men that made our lives so much more perfect and safe that well we may call them our saviors, for they indeed laid foundations so solid and strong that our Messrs. Ingersoll, Peck, Remsburg, and hundreds of others may stand and express their views unflinchingly and without fear of being assigned to the fate of a Bruno or some other hero—should we not, I ask you, again commemorate the lives and works of these great heroes in some manner, at that point where people from all nations meet in 1893? Now, as you can all plainly see, we must and will show to all the world what men were and at the present day are the representativs of Freethought and science. Monuments for each of our departed noble workers we can not build, but we may or can try to accomplish something. Let us build a hall in Chicago, as I mentioned in the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 1st. We hav enough Liberals in this country to contribute money sufficient to erect such a building and decorate the walls with portraits of our departed heroes. Then we will hav our co-Liberals, intelligent and able lecturers, who will try to make it as pleasant as possible to all visitors. We can readily see that the majority of people of this country up to the present time are not even aware of the fact that we had a Bruno, a Copernicus, or a Galileo, and if they hav ever heard their names mentioned by their orthodox friends, they hold an opinion as though these men had been the most notorious scoundrels. They know not what work these men accomplished. In fact, a great many believe, as Uncle Jasper says, "De sun do move." The greater part of these people, ignorant of the most valuable scientific facts, will visit the Fair, and then let our men enlighten them in a few days and teach them that which they did not learn in the parochial or religious school they attended during their years of schooling. Friends, it is patriotism to work for this cause. It is necessary for people of our belief to act. For this is our country; we must rejoice that Columbus found a place which has grown to be the headquarters of Liberalism—a place, a home, where a Liberal man may feel safe—a place which a little over three centuries after its discovery gave birth to a son who framed a Constitution for the United States so Liberal, so just, and so free from dogma that he may be full well counted among our departed Liberal heroes. Let us hear the opinion of the different readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER on this issue. Yours for Mental Liberty,

SIDNEY J. ROSENTHAL.

A Truly Interesting Letter.

KENT, O., July 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I love THE TRUTH SEEKER and I think it is growing better. And now my first question. I would say, the question of health is of the greatest importance. And there is so much ignorance on the laws of life and health even among our speakers. So general is the ignorance that one-half the human family die, in what are called civilized countries, by the time they are five years old, and the other half are so much poisoned with drugs that not one in a thousand dies a natural death. Therefore would it not be wise to open the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the discussion of hygiene? I do not wish to divert the attention of the readers of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER from the principles and measures so forcibly advocated by the illustrations and the noble correspondents. I intend to help the Truth Seeker Company, but, my dear brother, I hav overworked to such an extent that I had to change my manner of living. To show you what I am doing and hav tried to do, let me say, I hav sacrificed more for the cause of liberty and Freethought than any living man or woman probably in the state of Ohio, and perhaps in the United States. I fitted up my house to hold antislavery, woman's rights, temperance, and Secular meetings, and in the stormy times of persecution that arose when society was torn into factions by the agitation of these questions I lost all my bees. Several swarms were stolen, and the persecutors stole all my sheep, killed all my hogs (nine in number), killed a good yoke of oxen, shot my dog, and at last burnt my house. In this last affair I lost more than $1,800. Finally I was shot at one night. So from this you may learn what some of us had to pass through, and I hav not told you of more than one-half. I am sixty-four years old; never joined a church; nor drank a glass of liquor, beer, or anything of the kind; never smoked a cigar or pipe, or used tobacco, or drank a cup of tea or coffee; and never hav used any medicin for nearly fifty years. And I hav never had a chance to go to school, only when I was quite small, with the exception of thirteen days and a half. But I hav had several discussions with ministers and others on all of the leading questions of the day. The last set-to I had was with a Catholic priest. He lectured in Kent's Hall to a crowded house. All the ministers in town were present except one. During his remarks he said every Freethinker would lie and steal; every one was a monkey, only he had dropped his tail; every one lived on swill, and when any of the Secular lecturers came here to speak to this class of men or things, instead of commencing by saying, "Gentlemen and ladies," he ought to say, "Pigs, pigs;" that they were rotten as manure, and the more you stir them the more they will stink. And when he ceased the Methodist minister shook him by the hand most cordially and congratulated him. He was cheered most vehemently all through, but at last he thanked the audience for their attention and said: "If anyone dares to question the authority of the holy Bible let them do it now. I will answer all questions in a Christian manner." (Tremendous applause.) I arose and said: "'And the Lord was with Judah and he drove out the inhabitants from the mountains, but could not drive them out of the valley because they had chariots of iron.' The speaker will now please tell us what was the matter with the Lord that he could not drive them out of the valley." "Hav you any more questions?" said he. "Yes, forty of them," said I, "but we think this question demands a candid answer." But I could not induce him to answer. At last he said: "Ask all of your questions and I will answer them all in a Christian manner." I quoted: "Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be heavy of heart. Let him drink and forget his poverty and remember his misery no more." "Do you think this favors drunkenness?" said he. "Yes," said I, "for if he drinks until he can remember his misery no more he must be in a worse condition than I ever saw a drunkard, for I never saw a man so drunk that when he got over it he could not remember his misery any more, did you? Come, giv us some answer." Some one asked what the commentator said. I said: "The commentator says:

"Giv him strong drink until he wink,
That's sinking in despair,
And liquor good to fire his blood
And free his mind from care.
Then let him bouse and wild carouse,
With bumpers flowing o'er,
Till he forgets his loves and debts,
And minds his grief no more."

But he only said something about Judas, that I could not hear, and left without trying to answer any question.

In conclusion let me say I will promis you this, I will get another name for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Two Pictures.

A youthful painter found one day
In the streets of Rome a child at play;
And moved by the beauty that it bore,
The heavenly look its features wore,
On a canvas radiant and grand
He painted its face with a master hand.

Year after year on his wall it hung;
'Twas ever joyful and always young,
Driving away all thought of gloom
As the painter toiled in his lonely room.

But the painter's locks grew thin and gray;
His young ambition had passed away;
He looked for years in many a place
To find a contrast to that sweet face.
Through haunts of vice in the night he strayed
To find some ruin that crime had made:
And at last, in a prison cell, he caught
A glimpse of the hideous face he sought.

On a canvas, weird and wild, but grand,
He painted the features with master hand.

That loathsome wretch in the dungeon low,
With the face of a fiend and the look of woe,
Ruined by revels and stained by sin,
A pitiful wreck of what once he had been,
Hated, and shunned, and without a home,
Was the child that played in the streets of Rome.

The Captain's Vices.

(Selected by D. Davenport.)

I.

It is of no importance, the name of the little provincial city where Captain Mercadier—twenty-six years of service, twenty-two campaigns, and three wounds—installed himself when he was retired on a pension.

Captain Mercadier had chosen that place of retreat for the simple reason that he had been born there, and because, in his noisy childhood, he had pulled down the signs and plugged up the bell-buttons. He returned there to find neither relations nor friends nor acquaintances, and the recollections of his youth recalled only the angry faces of shopkeepers who shook their fists at him from the shop doors, a catechism which threatened him with hell, a school which predicted the scaffold, and, finally, his departure for his regiment, hastened by a paternal malediction.

For the captain was not a saintly man; the old record of his punishment was black with days in the guard house inflicted for breaches of disciplin, absences from roll-calls, and nocturnal uproars in the mess-room. He had often narrowly escaped losing his stripes as a corporal or a sergeant, and he needed all the chance, all the license of a campaigning life, to gain his first epaulet. Firm and brave soldier, he had passed almost all his life in Algiers at that time when our foot-soldiers wore the high shako, white shoulder-belts, and huge cartridge boxes.

Captain Mercadier—twenty-six years of service, twenty-two campaigns, and three wounds—had just retired on his pension, not quite two thousand francs, which, joined to the two hundred and fifty francs from his cross, placed him in that estate of honorable penury which the state reserves for its old servants.

His entry into his natal city was without ostentation. He arrived one morning on the imperiale of the diligence, chewing an extinguished cigar, and already on good terms with the conductor.

He installed himself at once. In a house in the outskirts, where two captiv cows lowed, and fowls and ducks passed and repassed through the gateway, a furnished chamber was to let. Preceded by a masculin-looking woman, the captain climbed the stairway with its great wooden balusters, perfumed by a strong odor of the stable, and reached a great tiled room, whose walls were covered with a bizarre paper representing, printed in blue on a white background and repeated infinitly, the picture of Joseph Poniatowski crossing the Elster on a horse. This monotonous decoration, recalling, nevertheless, our military glories, fascinated the captain, without doubt, for, without concerning himself with the uncomfortable straw chairs, the walnut furniture, or the little bed with its yellowed curtain, he took the room without hesitation. A quarter of an hour was enough to empty his trunk, hang up his clothes, put his boots in a corner, and ornament the wall with a trophy composed of three pipes, a saber, and a pair of pistols. After a visit to the grocer's, over the way, where he bought a pound of candles and a bottle of rum, he returned, put his purchase on the mantel-shelf, and looked around him with an air of perfect satisfaction. And then, with the promptitude of the camp, he shaved without a mirror, brushed his coat, cocked his hat over his ear, and went for a walk in the village in search of a cafe.

II.

It was an inveterate habit of the captain to spend much of his time at a cafe. It was there that he satisfied at the same time the three vices which reigned supreme in his heart—tobacco, absinthe, and cards. It was thus that he passed his life, and he could hav drawn a plan of all the places where he had ever been stationed by their tobacco shops, cafes, and military clubs. He never felt so thoroughly at ease as when sitting on a worn velvet bench before a square of green cloth, near a heap of beer mugs and saucers. His cigar never seemed good unless he struck his match under the marble of the table, and he never failed, after hanging his hat and his saber on a hat hook and settling himself comfortably, by loosening one or two buttons of his coat, to breathe a profound sigh of relief, and exclaim:

"That is better!"

It was his first care, therefore, to find an establishment which he could frequent, and after having gone around the village without finding anything that suited him, he stopped at last to regard with the eye of a connoisseur the Cafe Prosper, situated at the corner of the Place du Marche and the Rue de la Pavoisse.

Eight days after he had become one of the pillars of the Cafe Prosper.

They soon learned his punctual habits and anticipated his wishes, while he, in turn, lunched with the patrons of the place—a valuable recruit for those who haunted the cafe, folks oppressed by the tedium of a country life, for whom the arrival of a newcomer, past master in all names, an admirable raconteur of his wars and his loves, was a true stroke of good fortune. The captain himself was delighted to tell his stories to folks who were still ignorant of his repertoire. There were fully six months before him to tell of his games, his feats, his battles, the retreat of Constantine, the capture of Bou-Maza, and the officers' receptions with the concomitant intoxication of rum punch.

His usual auditors were the keeper of the cafe, a stupid and silent beer cask, always in his sleeved vest and remarkable only for his carved pipe; the bailiff, a scoffer, dressed invariably in black, scorned for his inelegant habit of carrying off what remained of his sugar; the town clerk, the gentleman of acrostics, a person of much amiability and a feeble constitution, who sent to the illustrated journals solutions of enigmas and rebuses; and, lastly, the veterinary surgeon of the place, the only one who, from his position of Atheist and democrat, was allowed to contradict the captain. This practitioner, a man with tufted whiskers and eyeglasses, presided over the radical committee of electors, and when the curé took up a little collection among his devotees for the purpose of adorning his church with some frightful red and gilded statues, denounced, in a letter to the Siecle, the cupidity of the Jesuits.

In short, the group lived harmoniously together and willingly permitted themselvs to be presided over by the newcomer, whose white beard and martial bearing were quite impressiv. And the small city, proud of so many things, was also proud of its retired captain.

III.

Perfect happiness exists nowhere, and Captain Mercadier, who believed that he had found it at the Cafe Prosper, soon recovered from his illusion.

For one thing, on Mondays, the market-day, the Cafe Prosper was untenantable.

From early morning it was overrun with truck peddlers, farmers, and poultry-men. Heavy men with coarse voices, red necks, and great whips in their hands, wearing blue blouses and otter skin caps, bargaining over their cups, stamping their feet, striking their fists, familiar with the servant, and bungling at billiards.

When the captain came at 11 o'clock, for his first glass of absinthe, he found this crowd gathered, and already half drunk, ordering a quantity of lunches. His usual place was taken, and he was served slowly and badly. The bell was continually sounding, and the proprietor and the waiter, with napkins under their arms, were running distractedly hither and thither. In short, it was an ill-omened day, which upset his entire existence.

Now, one Monday morning when he was resting quietly at home, being sure that the cafe would be much too full and busy, the mild radiance of the autumn sun persuaded him to go down and sit upon the stone seat by the side of the house. He was sitting there, depressed and smoking a damp cigar, when he saw coming down the end of the street—it was a badly paved lane leading out into the country—a little girl of eight or ten driving before her a half dozen geese.

As the captain looked carelessly at the child he saw that she had a wooden leg.

There was nothing paternal in the heart of the soldier. It was that of a hardened bachelor. In former days, in the streets of Algiers, when the little begging Arabs pursued him with their importunate prayers, the captain had often chased them away with blows from his whip; and on those rare occasions when he had penetrated the nomadic household of some comrade who was married and the father of a family, he had gone away cursing the crying babies and awkward children who had touched with their greasy hands the gilding on his uniform.

But the sight of that particular infirmity, which recalled to him the sad spectacle of wounds and amputations, touched, on tha account, the old soldier. He felt almost a constriction of the heart at the sight of that sorry creature, half-clothed in her tattered petticoats and old chemise, bravely running along behind her geese, her bare foot in the dust and limping on her ill-made wooden stump.

The geese, recognizing their home, turned into the poultry yard, and the little one was about to follow them when the captain stopped her with this question:

"Eh! little girl, what's your name?"

"Pierette, Monsieur, at your service," she answered, looking at him with her great black eyes, and pushing her disordered locks from her forehead.

"You liv in this house, then? I havn't seen you before."

"Yes, I knew you pretty well, though, for I sleep under the stairs, and you wake me up every evening when you come home."

"Is that so, my girl? Ah, well, I must walk on my toes in the future. How old are you?"

"Nine, Monsieur, come All Saints' day."

"Is the lardlady here a relativ of yours?"

"No, Monsieur, I am in service."

"And they giv you?"

"Soup, and a bed under the stairs."

"And how came you to be lame like that, my poor little one?"

"By the kick of a cow when I was five."

"Hav you a father or mother?"

The child blushed under her sun-burnt skin. "I came from the Foundling Hospital," she said briefly. Then, with an awkward courtesy, she passed limping into the house, and the captain heard, as she went away on the pavement of the court, the hard sound of the little wooden leg.

Good heavens! he thought, mechanically walking toward his cafe, that's not at all the thing. A soldier, at least, they pack off to the Invalides, with the money from his medal to keep him in tobacco. For an officer they fix up a collectorship, and he marries somewhere in the provinces. But this poor girl, with such an infirmity—that is not at all the thing!

Having established in these terms the injustice of fate, the captain reached the threshold of his dear cafe, but he saw such a mob of blue blouses, he heard such a din of laughter and clink of billiard balls, that he returned home in a very bad humor.

His room—it was, perhaps, the first time that he had spent in it several hours of the day—looked rather shabby. His bed-curtains were the color of an old pipe. The fireplace was heaped with old cigar stumps, and one could hav written his name in the dust on the furniture. He contemplated for some time the walls where the sublime lancer of Leipzig rode a hundred times to a glorious death. Then, for an occupation he passed his wardrobe in review. It was a lamentable series of bottomless pockets, socks full of holes, and shirts without buttons.

"I must hav a servant," he said.

Then he thought of the little lame girl.

"That's what I'll do. I'll hire the next little room. Winter is coming, and the little thing will freeze under the stairs. She will look after my clothes and my linen and keep the barracks clean. A valet, how's that?"

But a cloud darkened the comfortable picture. The captain remembered that quarter-day was still a long way off, and that his account at the Cafe Prosper was assuming alarming proportions.

"Not rich enough," he said to himself. "And in the mean time they are robbing me down there. That is positiv. The board is too high, and that wretch of a veterinary plays bezique much too well. I hav paid his way now for eight days. Who knows? Perhaps I better put the little one in charge of the mess, soup and cafe in the morning, stew at noon, and rag out every evening—campaign-life, in fact. I know all about that. Quite the thing to try."

Going out he saw at once the mistress of the house, a great brutal peasant, and the little lame girl, who both, with pitchforks in their hands, were turning over the dungheap in the yard.

"Does she know how to sew, to wash, to make soup?" he added brusquely.

"Who—Pierette? Why?"

"Does she?"

"Of course. She came from an asylum where they learn how to take care of themselvs."

"Tell me, my little one," added the captain, speaking to the child, "I am not scaring you—no? Well, my good woman, will you let me hav her? I want a servant."

"If you will support her."

"Then that is finished. Here are twenty francs. Let her hav to-night a dress and a shoe. To-morrow we'll arrange the rest."

And, with a friendly tap on Pierette's cheek, the captain went off, delighted that everything was concluded. Possibly he thought he would hav to cut off some glasses of beer and absinthe, and be cautious of the veterinary's skill at bezique. But that was not worth speaking of, and the new arrangement would be quite the thing.

IV

Captain, you are a coward!

Such was the apostrophe with which the caryatides of the Cafe Prosper hereafter greeted the captain, whose visits became rarer day by day.

For the poor man had not seen all the consequences of his good action. The suppression of his morning absinthe had been sufficient to cover the modest expense of his Pierette's keeping, but how many other reforms were needed to provide for the unforeseen expenses of his bachelor establishment! Full of gratitude, the little girl wished to prove it by her zeal. Already the aspect of his room was changed. The furniture was dusted and arranged, the fireplace cleaned, the floor polished, and spiders no longer spun their webs over the deaths of Poniatowski in the corner. When the captain came home the inviting odor of cabbage soup saluted him on the staircase, and the sight of the smoking plates on the coarse but white table-cloth, with a bunch of flowers and polished tableware, was quite enough to giv him a good appetite. Pierette profited by the good humor of her master to confess some of her secret ambitions. She wanted andirons for the fireplace, where there was now always a fire burning, and a mold for the little cakes she knew how to make so well. And the captain, smiling at the child's requests, but charmed with the homelike atmosphere of his rooms, promised to think of it, and on the morrow replaced his Londres by cigars for a sou each, hesitated to offer five points at ecarte, and refused his third glass of beer or his second glass of chartreuse.

Certainly the struggle was long: it was cruel. Often, when the hour came for the glass that was denied him by economy, when thirst seized him by the throat, the captain was forced to make a heroic effort to withdraw his hand already reaching out to the swan's beak of the cafe; many times he wandered about dreaming of the king turned up and of quint and quatorze. But he almost always courageously returned home; and as he loved Pierette more through every sacrifice that he made for her, he embraced her more fondly every day. For he did embrace her. She was no longer his servant. When once she stood before him at the table, calling him "Monsieur," and so respectful in her bearing, he could not stand it, but seizing her by her two hands, he said to her eagerly:

"First embrace me and then sit down and do me the pleasure of speaking familiarly, confound it!"

And so to day it is accomplished. Meeting a child has saved that man from an ignominious age

He has substituted for his old vices a young passion. He adores the little lame girl who skips around him in his room, which is comfortable and well furnished.

He has already taught Pierette to read, and, moreover, recalling his caligraphy as a sergeant-major, he has set her copies in writing. It is his greatest joy when the child, bending attentivly over her paper, and sometimes making a blot, which she quickly licks up with her tongue, has succeeded in copying all the letters of an interminable adverb in ment. His uneasiness is in thinking that he is growing old and has nothing to leave his adopted child.

And so he becomes almost a miser; he theorizes; he wishes to giv up his tobacco, although Pierette herself fills and lights his pipe for him. He counts on saving from his slender income enough to purchase a little stock of fancy goods. Then, when is dead, she can liv an obscure and tranquil life, hanging up somewhere in the back room of the small shop an old cross of the Legion of Honor—her souvenir of the captain.

Every day he goes to walk with her on the rampart. Sometimes they are passed by folks who are strangers in the village, who look with compassionate surprise at the old soldier, spared from the wars, and the poor lame child. And he is moved—oh, so pleasantly, almost to tears—when one of the passers-by whispers as they pass:

"Poor father! Yet how pretty his daughter is."—Francois Coppee. From "Ten Tales by Francois Coppee," Messrs. Harper & Brothers.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparativ oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

OTTO WETTSTEIN, ROCHELLE, ILL.

Send 10 cents for this valuable book for young and middle aged men, suffering from a Life-wasting Disease, as the result of youthful follies, indiscretion, and excesses in maturer years. It sets forth an External Application—A POSITIVE CURE, as it matters not how long standing, how hopeless or how many remedies you hav used. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those seeking a speedy and permanent cure. Address Dr. Robt. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

A GOOD WORD.

Dr. Fellows is an outspoken Liberal, a humanitarian, and a generous patron of the Freethought press. He has many testimonials to the value of his progressive and successful method of treatment, and deserves patronage.—Freethought.

ESSENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY LUDWIG FEUERBACH.

Translated from the German by Geo. Eliot.

Price, $3.

News of the Week.

CHILIAN insurgents gained a great victory and took Valparaiso on the 28 h ult.

THE sultan is about to administer to his three youngest sons the Mohammedan rite of circumcision, and according to custom five thousand other children will undergo it on the occasion.

LIGHTNING struck a church at Tolmezzo, Germany, during mass and killed three persons.

GERSHEN OPING, a Jew from Ischilds, Russia, says that this notice was posted on all lamp-posts and telegraph poles: "Be it known to all persons concerned that from this day forth no Jew will be allowed near the border. Any Russian seeing a Jew in or trying to cross the border is allowed to take all his clothes and the property on his person; also to maltreat and ill-use him, but not to kill him. The penalty for killing him will be $20."

THE reigning dynasty in China, which is not nativ but Tartar, seems menaced by a revolution of natives. Li Hung Chang, prime minister, called the Bismarck of China, may join the revolutionists to mount the throne. A revolution would hav exaltation of natives and destruction of all foreigners as a war-cry, and European residents might be massacred. China might then be subdued by and portioned out among the European powers, who in this action would probably become embroiled among themselves.

IN accordance with Gladstone's suggestion, a magazine called Darkest Russia has been started in England, to publish the Jewish persecutions.

CHRISTINA BEHRA, of Brooklyn, has cataleptic attacks and recently came near being buried while in a trance, and consequently her sister declares her a witch.

A WRITER from Russia says that the most serious point of the persecution of the Jews is their general outlawry. Every petty Russian official assumes the right to treat them as he sees fit. Libau police forbid Jews bathing in the sea in summer.

RUSSIA has prohibited rye exportation. The farmers of America, says the London Daily News, are masters of the situation. The News hopes that they will use their strength mercifully. "The making of corners in the necessaries of life is never laudable, and in the present juncture it would be little short of fiendish."

A WOMAN of Milan, Italy, named Franciosi, had an ill child, and was told by a neighbor that its illness was due to a woman called Richetti, who was a witch. The mother assaulted the witch in church and the priest who separated them remarked while giving witness at a trial for the assault that there are no witches now. "And never were," said the judge. The priest rejoined that he knew that there were witches formerly, as he had received absolute proof. A short time after, the mother and her friend dragged Mrs. Richetti to the child's bedside, and unheeding her protestations that she was not a witch, compelled her to repeat a formula unwitching the child, and then cut off her hair to deprive her of all sorcerous power thereafter.

TSIN CHIN CHUNG, governor of Amoy, China, said: "China, having followed its own principles of advancement during more than five thousand years, is now compelled to change and move along European channels. It has begun to own steamships and railways. Its telegraph now covers every province. It has at last mills, forges, and foundries, like those of Essen, of Sheffield, and of Pittsburgh. China is to-day learning that lesson in education which Europe has obliged her to learn, the art of killing, the science of armies and navies. Woe, then, to the world if the scholar, profiting by her lesson, should apply it in turn. With its freedom from debt, its inexhaustible resources, and its teeming millions, this empire might be the menace, if not the destroyer, of Christendom. No matter what happens, it needs no prophetic gift to know that the twentieth century will see at the forefront of the nations of the world China in the East and America in the West. Well may we pray that for the welfare of humanity their purposes will be as peaceful and upright as to-day."

NEHEMIAH RAISETH AN EXCEEDING GREAT RUMPUS.

And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not giv your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselvs.—Nehemiah xiii, 25.

Gems of Thought.

SOME people with whom I talk, men and women even of some originality and genius, hav their scheme of the universe all cut and dried, very dry,—I assure you, to hear, dry enough to burn, dry-rotted and powder-post, methinks,—which they set up between you and them in the shortest intercourse; an ancient and tottering frame with all its boards blown off. . . . Some, to me, seemingly very unimportant and unsubstantial things and relations, are for them everlastingly settled,—as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and the like. These are like the everlasting hills to them. But in all my wanderings I never came across the least vestige of authority for these things. They hav not left so distinct a trace as the delicate flower of a remote geological period on the coal in my grate.—Thoreau.

THE great misfortune of a philosopher is not perhaps being the object of the jealousy of his brother scholars, the victim of cabals, and the contempt of the powerful of the world,—it is being judged by fools. Fools sometimes go very far, particularly when fanaticism is joined to folly, and folly to the spirit of vengeance. Further, the great misfortune of a philosopher is generally to hold to nothing. A citizen buys a little situation and is maintained by his fellow-citizens. If any injustice is done him he soon finds defenders. The literary man is without aid; he resembles the flying fish. If he rises a little the birds devour him; if he dives, the fishes eat him up.—Voltaire.

EVERY church is a kind of insurance society, and proposes, for a small premium, to keep you from eternal fire. Of course, the man who tells you that there is to be no fire, interferes with the business, and is denounced as a malicious meddler and blasphemer.—Ingersoll.

TURNING to the New Testament morality, we may attack it in various ways: we may argue that the better part of it is not new, and therefore cannot be regarded as especially inspired, or that it leaves out of account many virtues necessary to the well-being of families and states; or we may contend that much of it is harmful, and much of it impracticable.—Annie Besant.

BE CONTENT.

Said the parson, "Be content,
Pay your tithe-dues, pay your rent,
They that earthly things despise
Shall hav mansions in the skies;
Though your back with toil be bent,"
Said the parson, "Be content."

Then the parson feasting went
With my lord who livs by rent;
And the parson laughed elate,
For my lord has livings great.
They that earthly things revere,
May get bishops' mansions here.

Be content! be content!
Till your dreary life is spent.
Lowly liv, and lowly die,
All for mansions in the sky.
Castles here are much too rare;
All may hav them—in the air.

—T. Maguire.

GENUIN belief is always manifested in corresponding action. Belief in the existence of a pitfall, the approach of an avalanche, or the presence of a wild beast, is always eagerly communicated to others. Men will not allow others to go into danger without warning and without deep concern for their welfare. Judged by this rule, how many really believe the doctrin of everlasting punishment? If men all around us are going down to an eternal hell, and Christians believe it and know of an easy way of escape, would they so seldom vary their lives of business and pleasure by a word to the impenitent? Would they be able to liv contentedly in a round of diversion, music, embroidery, and cigar-smoking, while their neighbors are dropping into ceaseless doom, where "the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever?" Would ministers of churches only make vague allusions to the dread dogma, and leave the preaching of terror to evangelists, without charge of societies, who are not imperiled by the dissent of parishioners? It is seldom preached now in city churches, and ministers' minds are everywhere perplexed in the effort to reconcile revelation with good taste.—R. O. Adams.

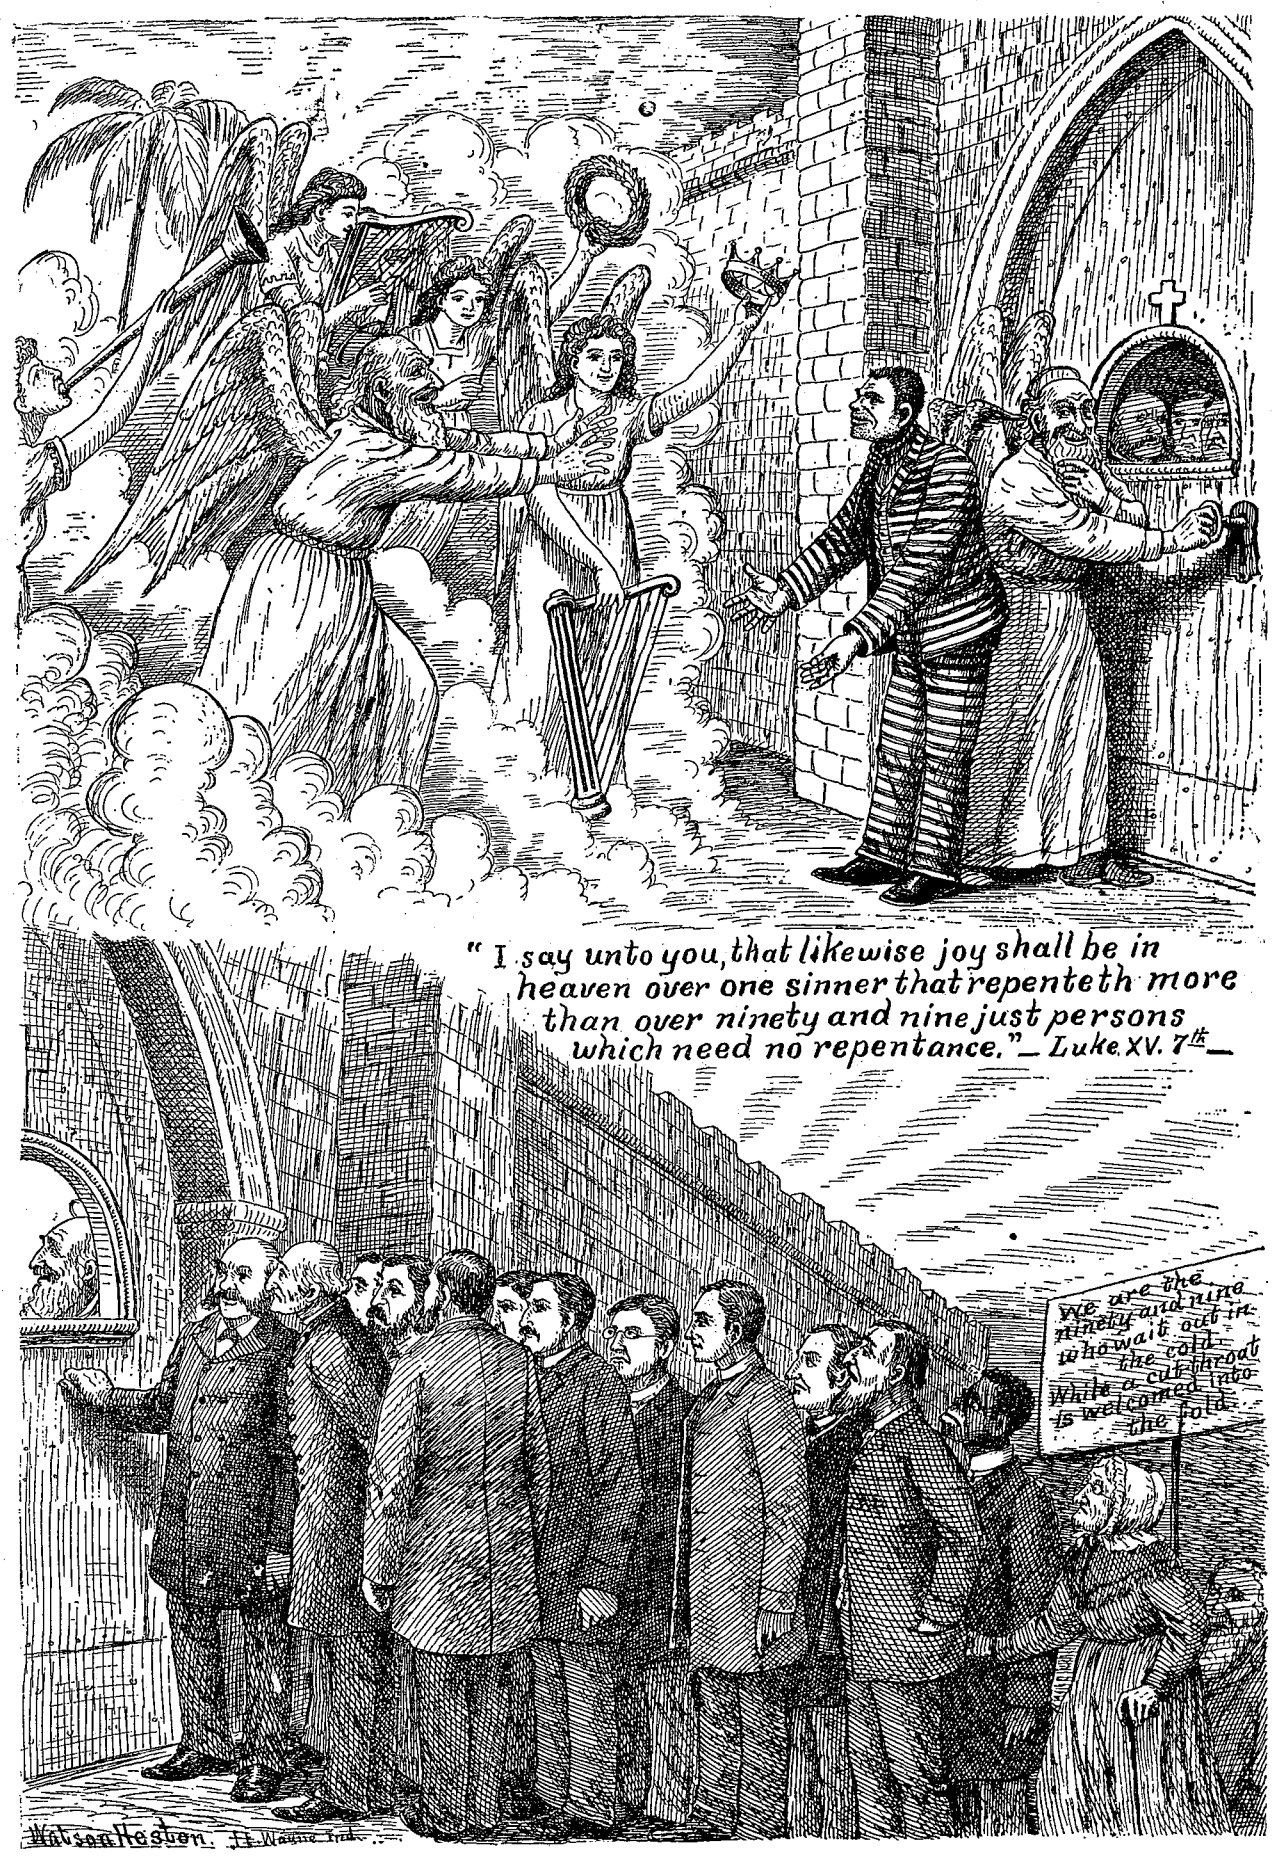
Notes and Clippings.

THE indictment of the Catholic church by John Brisbane Walker, editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine, is to this effect: The spirit of the gospel was never understood or inculcated by the church; priests did not care for the poor, and at present they do not preach enough against the ways of the millionaire, the corruption of the legislature, and the inroads of rum; the church, in fact, has been the oppressor of the poor, and under her ægis, with her blessing, and to the music of her Te Deums, robber barons hav grown prosperous and the sacredness of property rights has been inculcated.



AN Arab now in New York city, named Rellim Trebor, writes to the Sun: "While this country's Constitution admits of freedom of speech and worship it will not permit a chief magistrate to be guided by 'the old man in Rome,' as certainly a Catholic president would be to a certain extent, if not entirely. This will be generally denied by Catholics, but I would like to meet one honest man who can say that their clergy does not dabble in politics. In one instance I put the question to a Catholic laborer, and he frankly admitted that his voting was guided by what the priest had said to him. In the event of a Catholic being a candidate for the presidency, few Catholic voters would not cast their ballots in his favor. The entire clergy of the Roman church would form a solid phalanx, and in each of their respectiv parishes would perform more effectiv stumping than any politician has ever done."

THE education question has invaded England, last of all governments to be troubled by it. . . . In this country it has taken the form of a contest between Catholics and Protestants, in France between the republic and the monarchy, in Italy between the Reds and the Vatican; but no matter what its form, it is simply the struggle of pure paganism against Christ for the possession of this world. The power which trains the children, all other influences to the contrary, will rule the world.—Catholic Review.

THE czar inherited his fanatical zeal and intolerance from his mother, whose intense religious fervor warped her whole life and made her almost a monomaniac. This element of the czar's character has been greatly developed by the circumstances of his reign and by the shrewd machinations of his clerical advisers, who hav led him to believe that all the evils which befell his father and which hav come to him were sent by heaven in punishment for laxity of faith and to drive him back to earnestness in suppressing heresy. He believes that peace and prosperity can only be secured by smiting all unbelievers with an unsparing hand. So he has given free rein to the most violent and extreme spirits among the orthodox propagandists, to revive and enforce every stern religious law, and to enact any new ones that may seem desirable for crushing out all dissent from the orthodox creed.

THE recent founding of a chair of sociology in a theological seminary is suggestiv, as is also the fact that the professorship became at once the most popular one in the institution. President Hyde declares for displacement of theology by sociology.

THE attention of the Italian minister of education has been called to the fact that the best pictures of the great masters are kept concealed from the eyes of the public in the various churches which own them. Not only has the public no benefit of them, but the most precious works of art themselvs are consigned to rot for want of light and air. The minister has therefore ordered that churches owning such pictures shall exhibit them where the public may be able to see them and they may hav light and air.

HEAVENLY PREFERENCES—HOW TO MEET WITH A WARM RECEPTION.

A RUSSIAN dispatch says: "The ferocity of the persecutions of the Jews seems to increase rather than diminish. The few privileges that they hav enjoyed are one by one taken from them. Almost every day sees some new edict issued against them, or some new stringency exercised in the execution of existing laws. Protests from outside, whether from private individuals or from organized societies, do no good, if, indeed, they do not actually do harm. The reason of this lies in the very nature of the case. This Jew-baiting is a purely religious persecution. The czar so regards it, and so do his ministers and all Russian officials. The talk about the Jews being obnoxious for social or industrial reasons is nonsense, and when put forward by the Russian press is intended merely to bamboozle the gullible. The Jews are hated simply because they are not and will not become members of the Greek church, and everyone else who persists in remaining outside of the pale of orthodoxy is hated just the same. In proof of this one has only to observe the persecution that is being directed against the Stundists, the Old Believers, Lutherans, and others. In the eyes of this fanatical and bigoted government, all Protestants and Roman Catholics are accursed heretics, whom it is the duty of the orthodox believers to persecute, despoil, and destroy.'

RUSSIAN authorities hav closed the Jewish Temple at St. Petersburg.

NEVER before in all history was the altruistic feeling so strong and so sensitiv as now. Charity is the animating spirit of modern Christianity, not as mere sentiment, but as a practical obligation. As dogmatic religion loses its hold churches cultivate charity in its place. Yet we see that after piety has been stimulated to exertions so unexampled, there remains an undiminished host of paupers for the state to care for. Instead of curing poverty we seem to be breeding pauperism. The number of the really suffering and deserving poor is not less, but the multitude who prefer begging to working increases rapidly.—Sun.

AT the meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Dr. Prescott said: "There is no greater need in this land than the need of advancement in science. Let this be understood by all—if America is not to fall short in the nurture of manhood, in the reach of mind and in the arts of peace; if she is not to fall short altogether, she must advance in science and must cherish her workers in scientific research."

Communications.

The Christian's God on the Rampage, with Side-shows (Concluded).

The great cotton and woolen factory of Campbell & Elliot, of Philadelphia, is destroyed by fire. Loss nearly three-quarters of a million. Five hundred men, women, and children thrown out of employment—perhaps some to starve. Is this all for the best?

It is to be remembered that God is in every engin of destruction. He is in the powder which blows up the magazine, in the steam which explodes the boiler, in the gale which capsizes the vessel, in the tornado which devastates a country, in the drunkard's whisky. He is in the house of the harlot as much as in the church, in the tiger as much as in the lamb. Could Vesuvius hav burnt Pompeii and Herculaneum without God's consent? If the Christian claims, as he sometimes does, that God has nothing to do with these calamities, then I agree with him. For if an earthquake can occur without his help, a cabbage-head can grow without his assistance. The moment it is admitted that the simplest processes of nature can be carried on without God's help, the whole ground is swept from under the Christian's feet. For if the simplest operations of nature can take place without a God, so can the most complex.

According to the Christian's idea of God he is one of the most spotted, leprous, fickle, and unreliable beings that we know anything about. At one time he turns a soft side to the Christian, and sends him a plentiful harvest and blesses him in basket and store, and then celestial stock is at a premium. At another time he sends a hailstorm or a flood and destroys all his crops, and then, instead of thanksgiving and praise, certain cuss-words stick in his throat which he dare not utter.

My Christian friend, if you study the subject closely you will find that while God blesses you he afflicts somebody else. While he fills your basket another starves. While he sends health and prosperity to one country he devastates another with flood and famin. What do you want of such a God, anyhow?

For years I hav got along without any God, and so can you. You know how often you soil the knees of your best pants in kneeling down to him, you know how much it costs you to build great steeple-houses for him to perform in, you know how much you pay the minister for eating your yellow-legged chickens and shining around your wife and daughters, and you know that you would do none of those things were it not for the hope of heaven or the fear of hell; and when you find out that God is a myth and that heaven and hell only exist in the imagination of fanatics, and how selfish ministers hav fooled you, you will invent a machine for kicking yourself behind and get it patented.

O stop, poor Christian, stop and think
Before you farther go,
Bounce the preacher quick as wink,
Don't let him fool you so.

I hav been very sick; my brain has been on the gallop, and some of my Christian friends think it has not yet settled down to a rational pace. Lunatics rarely believe themselvs to be of unsound mind, and Christian lunatics believe that everybody is crazy who does not believe that God got so mad that he had to kill himself, because a woman ate an apple six thousand years ago, which he placed before her in such a tempting manner that she could not resist the temptation.

If I am correctly informed, some Christians, thinking to do God a friendly turn, laid a plan to take the fort while in a weakened condition. They thought while death was staring me in the face they could make me weaken and send for the minister, and indorse their nonsensical drivel, and then they would hav another deathbed repentance of an Infidel to report in religious papers and to talk about in the Sunday-schools. But for some reason they did not put their plan into execution. I wish they had.

I hav lived in this place nearly a quarter of a century, and would hav been pleased at any time to receive them. They showed their cowardice by trying to take advantage of my weakness. Christians are always heroic when they think there is an advantage on their side. I wish to say now that as long as I can talk and hav my senses, Christians will be free to talk with me about the fall, the plan of redemption, and heaven and hell as long as it seemeth good to them. I shall only be too happy to show them how silly the whole thing is. If I had died would it hav changed the law of gravitation? Would my death hav changed falsehood into fact? Because I was at death's door would I believe that two and two make five, while in my senses? Because I was sick, would Joshua's planetary trick or Samson's great jawbone feats appear more reasonable to me? Until the mind was dethroned I could not hav believed that a lot of dead men someway managed to get out of their graves and ramble round the neighborhood, or that a dead man came to life when he touched the bones of another dead man.

If Christians think they can make me believe these impossibilities, they are at liberty to try their hand any day. But they had better lie back and take it out in praying than to enter the field of fair and open discussion when the chances are equal. And if I could be allowed to giv them a little friendly advice, it would be to write out their prayers and put them in a revolving cylinder as they do in Thibet and keep them in perpetual motion; for it will take an awful sight of praying to make me believe that the blood of a man who died two thousand years ago can neutralize all the sins of the world.

I do not believe my pious friends would hav made much capital in trying to take advantage of me even in my prostrate condition. For I had no fear of their hell and no hope of their imaginary heaven. To tell plain truth, I did not think much about such matters. I was more concerned about those I thought I was leaving behind me than about my own condition. I told my son-in-law that I was getting quite well along in years, and it was possible it might prove my last sickness. But I meant to get away in good shape and not go off blubbering.

If there are any meritorious acts to be placed to my account, they hav been performed for the good of myself or others. Whatever wrongs I hav been guilty of committing will hav their evil effects upon myself or society. The thought of the evil effects of wrong-doing will prove a sufficient punishment for every wrong act. These are all the rewards or punishments which I know anything about. I hav not done anything to escape the pains of a fictitious hell nor to secure the bliss of an imaginary heaven.

I hope good Christians will not trouble themselvs about what I hav done to displease God. If he is possessed of all knowledge and all power he certainly could deal with me according to my deserts without any interference on the part of Christians.

I think the Christian makes a fool of himself when he offers to help God or tries to take work out of his hands.

All of the persecutions hav been perpetrated because Christians believed they could help God. They believed that those whom they persecuted had offended God and that the offense had made him as savage as a wildcat, and that it would afford him infinit delight to put them through an eternal sizzle-sozzle in the liquid flames of a brimstone hell. And so they thought the sooner the punishment was commenced the more it would tickle God. The woman-whippers and witch-hunters were actuated by such beliefs. Wanamaker and Comstock think they can please God by discommoding and punishing men.

Right here I must break off and relate a dream. I dreamed that Colonel Bob and Comstock died and arrived at heaven's gate at the same time. And while the gate was ajar and St. Peter was welcoming his friend Bob, Comstock slipped through unobserved. Pretty quick the old celestial boss came along, and he frowns an awful frown, and then he says, "You Pete, open that gate quick now." And he then turned to Comstock and said, "Tony, if you don't get out of here in the twinkle of a rat's tail, I'll introduce a square-toed boot to the part I showed to old Moses." This is only a dream, but it is just as reasonable as anything that Milton or Pollock or John Bun-ion ever said about heaven.

I never heard of God punishing anybody for the violation of Sunday laws. It is all done by the Christians to help God along. They seem to go upon the supposition that God is inadequate or too busy to attend to his own affairs.

Out West the people are getting wiser and leave the penalty for the violation of Sunday entirely with God. If all Christians could hav believed that God was capable of attending to his own business what a world of persecution and torture it would hav saved. Following is a notice verbatim clipped from the Seattle, Wash., Telegraph, of July 4, 1891:

BALLOON ASCENSION.

I heard of a colored minister giving quite a vivid description of the last day, when Gabriel should blow his trump and the heavens should be rolled together like a scroll and the earth melt with fervent heat, when a colored brother cried out, "Ef I eber heah de soun' ob dat ho'n you see dis darky take to de woods."

Now, my Christian friends, if you find out that this Sunday entertainment makes God awful mad, and he swears in his wrath, and draws the Seattleites across his knee and confounds their language and rains fire and brimstone on the place, then you squat low and "take to de woods." On the other hand, if he does not get mad, and pays no attention to the Sunday amusements at West Seattle, then you can throw up your heels and hav a good time on Sunday without any fear of the trip-hammer of God's wrath.

If a tornado should sweep over West Seattle and tear down the houses, Christians would say that it was a manifestation of God's wrath for the desecration of the Sabbath.

But Christians never reason far enough to understand the unreasonableness of their conclusion. If the houses of Christians were spared and the houses of those who attended the dance and balloon ascension on Sunday were taken it would be a fair inference that God was displeased with the Sunday show at West Seattle.

But God never deals in that way. In time of a great calamity Christians fare no better than Infidels. Right before me is an account of a church which was struck with lightning while Christians were engaged in worship. Not long ago I saw a statement in regard to a minister who was struck with lightning while in the attitude of prayer. This does not show good breeding on the part of God. And when I think of some of his outlandish tricks, such as killing a child to punish a mother, I am inclined to think that he was of low parentage and brought up in a disreputable family, and that his surroundings in his youthful days were not favorable for the development of high moral character.

According to all the biographical sketches I hav read about God he has always been going back on his own. Yellow fever and cholera hav swept off thousands of Christians, notwithstanding the promis that they shall cure all manner of diseases and that serpents and poison shall not hurt them. A flood or tornado has no respect for a Christian. This ought to satisfy everyone that God has no special regard for a Christian more than he has for an Infidel.

Infidels fare just as well here as Christians do. They fare a great deal better when they come to die, for they die more like rational beings, and if there is any hereafter they will occupy the cushioned seats in the king-row.

When the Christian sits down to his table, puts on a long face, shuts his eyes and looks as though he was struck with death, and thanks his God for the blessing spread out before him, he thinks God will show him special favors for spooning around him.

The Infidel sits down to just as good a meal without making a fool of himself, partakes with just as keen a relish, and does not think of thanking an imaginary being above the clouds for what he has himself provided.

The Christian fashions a being in his mind and seats him on a cloud or throne, then imagins that certain things will please him and certain things will make him mad, and so he tries to shape his life so as not to incur the displeasure of a being which he has created in his own mind.

Once or twice a day he gets down on his haunches like a dog, and tells him what a great and powerful being he is; that he holds the destiny of worlds in his hand, and that we are indebted to him for every breath we draw, and after flattering him until he is supposed to be in good humor, he asks him to waive the eternal laws which he himself has established just enough to grant certain favors which he greatly stands in need of. At the same time he asks this being which he has fashioned to remember his friends, and also to damn his enemies, especially those who do not believe as he does.

The savage takes a block of wood and fashions it out in something like human form, daubs it with fancy colors, decks it out with beads and shells, and then gets down before this monstrosity and asks it to giv him good hunting-grounds—to make him successful on the war-path—to giv the enemy into his hands that he may take their scalps and drink their blood.

Will Talmage come to the front and tell the difference between a Christian and a savage? The savage's wooden god grants him no favors, and the Christian's God pays no attention to what the Christian says. The savage shows as good sense as the Christian.

At a very tender age a Christian father began to talk to you about a great being in the skies, and clothed him with certain powers and attributes which neither he nor any other man knew anything about. You, in turn, tell the same story to your children, and thus these superstitions are handed over from one generation to another, without thought, without investigation or consideration.

If one could look into the minds of Christians and get an understanding of their various conceptions of God, it would be found that no two hav the same ideas of his powers and attributes. The opinions of Christians in regard to a supreme being are as variable as the views in a kaleidoscope.

There is not a Christian in the world who knows how God looks, or how big he is, or whether he has a head like a man or a horse, or a tail like an alligator. Christians say that he "plants his footsteps on the sea and rides upon the storm." How do they know that he plants his footsteps on the sea? If he is as big as they claim, holy smoke! what a splashing he must make! And whether he "rides upon the storm," or upon a bicycle, no Christian can tell. Being all-powerful, perhaps he rides on a wheelbarrow and pushes it himself. It is not very modest for a man to boast of what he knows. But I will venture to say that I know just as much about God as any man that livs; and every other man knows just as much as I do. I appeal to every Christian—now, honor bright, is there stored away, even in the remotest corners of your mind, the least knowledge of God or hell? If there is, you can certainly tell something about them.

Parton says if a man wants to render himself famous let him bring just one new thought before the world. And I will guarantee to any Christian such fame as was never awarded to mortal man, who will giv us some positiv information in regard to these places or God.

The truth is, the whole Christian scheme is based upon what nobody knows anything about.

Talmage says: "The first step of the soul after it leaves the body reaches the stars, and the next step to the fartherest outposts of God's universe, and it will not die until the everlasting Jehovah expires." Talmage is the great mogul among the chosen—God's chief fugleman on earth—but could he prove a single assertion he makes? Again, he says, "God will step on the nearest star and then on a planet, and then down to the earth." What does he know about God walking on the stars more than anybody else? It is mere assertion, like everything else which givs countenance to and upholds the rotten old system. And again, "I tell you the world is a liar, it is a cheat—it is a bogus world—it is a six-thousand-year-old swindle." I do not know of so great a cheat or so big a swindle as the Christian religion which Talmage is trying to uphold.

Miss Craddock tells how to make young Infidels; but I want to tell young Infidels how to kill Christians. And I would like to hav them giv 'em "1" straight from the shoulder. When you hear a Christian talking about his religion, watch every sentence closely and you will find that one-half that he says he doesn't know anything about. Whenever he makes an assertion that has no foundation in fact, stop him right there and make him tell how he knows his statements to be true. Follow this plan closely, and if you do not kill a Christian, you will soon make him breathe short.

When a Christian begins to talk about God and tells what he likes and what is displeasing to him, stop him short and make him tell how he found out what displeases God. When he puts a lying spirit into the mouths of his own prophets, who shall be able to tell whether he is most pleased with vice or virtue?

Let every Christian question himself closely in regard to what he absolutely knows about God and he will find out that he cannot produce one iota of proof that any such being exists. If God is the author of all things—if nothing can take place without his knowledge and consent—then he inspires the robber and prompts the cutthroat, and the devil has nothing to do with it. If God has power over the devil then he is only an agent in God's hands. Now I would like to impress a few ideas upon the Christian mind:

First: That God does not favor Christians more than he does Infidels. At a church picnic, a short time ago, forty persons were poisoned with ice-cream. I hav attended a good many Infidel conventions and never heard of an Infidel being poisoned. I would like to inquire if there are many Christians who fare better than Colonel Ingersoll. How does it happen there are so many Christians living a sort of slip-shod life, while he is blessed above the common lot of men?

Second: I would like to disabuse the Christian mind of the idea that all great and good men were Christians. Washington, Franklin, John and Samuel Adams, Paine, and many of the leading minds of the Revolution were not orthodox Christians. There are very few men who hav wielded a greater influence over the destinies of this nation than Jefferson and Lincoln—both were Infidels.

Third: I would like to banish from the minds of Christians the idea that God watches over us and cares for us, and orders everything for our good. To believe this doctrin we must say that railroad accidents, in which women and children are mangled to a shapeless mass or burnt to a cinder, and shipwrecks, where hundreds go to the bottom of the deep, and fires in the great cities, which sweep away millions of dollars' worth of property and hundreds of human lives, are all for the best and for our good. If this idea is founded in reason, then multiply the devils and keep them all busy, for there can be no evil in this world.

Fourth: The idea of gods, devils, and angels is as fallacious as the idea of genii, gnomes, and fairies. All are alike creatures of the imagination. The latter are no longer believed in, the former must sooner or later share the same fate. The genii, gnomes, and fairies never did any good or hurt, neither did the gods, devils, or angels. Only the belief in them can affect us for good or evil.

When the Christian prays he talks to open space. There is no ear to hear, no eye to see, no brain to understand. It is like whipping the air—no result follows the prayer. The devil is a kind of imaginary bull-dog which Christians find convenient to set on their enemies—a sort of moral scarecrow to frighten men into the church—a scapegoat to bear the sins of Christians. A man here was detected in stealing and he laid it to the devil. The brethren accepted the explanation and kept him in the church. If the devil is more powerful than God he is the one to whom Christians ought to address their prayers. If he is less powerful than God what does he amount to anyway? God can put him out of the way any moment and therefore is responsible for all his acts. As for angels, if they exist at all, it is so rare that they light upon the earth that I hav never been able to get a shot at one. We hav a taxidermist in our place, and I hold him under agreement to stuff the first specimen I can obtain and put it up in good shape.

A little wholesome advice to you, my Christian friends, and then we part company.

When you giv your money to a lazy priest or minister you encourage idleness and mendacity, and help to keep an undeserving class of men from bearing their share of the burdens of society, and therefore become party to the wrong. We hav now about eighty thousand of this worthless class who not only pray for the people but prey upon the industry of the working classes and liv more sumptuously than those who foolishly support them.

If there is a class of men in this country who hav put me to my wits' end to know my duty in regard to them, it is the priests and ministers, for I could never make up my mind whether I ought to pity or despise them. Too lazy to work and perhaps a few of them too honest to steal, too dull to liv by their wits, a sort of human sponge sucking up the substance of the people, and occupying a position midway between indolence and criminality.

Whenever you giv your aid or influence to send out one of these lazy leeches to draw out the life-blood of society, you encourage dishonesty and thriftlessness and set an example which all people who hav any self-respect ought to be ashamed to imitate. Do try to set a better example.

When you help to build a church you take so much away from your family and put it where it will help to make other fools who will do the same thing, but it never will result in any good. And although you may think the tall steeple will tickle God oftentimes after it is dedicated to his service, he shows what he thinks of it by sending a bolt of lightning to demolish it. In proportion to their numbers there are more churches struck with lightning than any other buildings. Another thing. When you get down on your knees and ask a great imaginary nothing, which you claim is unchangeable, to alter his plans for your accommodation, you make a big fool of yourself. By exercising a little common sense you will soon come to see the absurdities of your position, and then, if you are honest, you will abandon it.

Christians assert that God is everywhere. And then when they come to die they talk about going home to see God and enjoying his presence. Is not this the very cream of nonsense? If God is everywhere they hav always enjoyed his presence.

But, my pious comrades, I must bid you adieu. I can pursue this theme no farther. If you do not profit by the pointers I hav already given you, more will avail nothing. I hav blazed some trees along the pathway of reason and common sense, and if you miss the way the fault is not mine. And now, my Christian friends, one and all, I bid you an affectionate farewell.

And now may the grace of the almighty Ding-Whang abide with you all now and evermore.

Naples, N. Y. JOHN PECK.

The Cause in Washington.

Rheumatism in my right shoulder, extending down to my wrist, made writing or using the type-writer positiv torture. I hav tried all sorts of advertised remedies without one particle of relief. Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., the great physician and Infidel philanthropist, of Lexington avenue, New York city, author of that admirable work, "Plain Home Talk; or, Medical Common Sense," the very best work on hygiene and the marriage relation ever published, has since I first met him ever proved my generous, helpful, and sympathetic friend. He writes me he will guarantee my cure and restore to me health, strength, and an excellent appetite; his only fear being lest after he has insured me a voracious appetite the Liberal friends should fail in supplying me with the wherewithal to appease it. He very generously promises to furnish me advice and all necessary medicin free of all cost. So, awaiting the arrival of the medicin, I accompanied my good wife on her mission to Whatcom county.

OUR FIELD SECRETARY.

Mrs. F. C. Reynolds has accomplished much efficient work. She has delivered lectures at Coupeville, Island county; Willipa, Towner school-house, and city of South Bend, Pacific county; Cathlamet, Wahkiakum county; Snohomish, Snohomish county; Teanaway, Kittitas county; and Roder, Nooksack Crossing, and Sumas City, Whatcom county.

In this connection it is a pleasing duty to publish the list of generous and true friends to the cause who hav paid contributions to the field secretary fund.

J. F. Miller, of Lynden, Whatcom county	$10 00
Mrs. M. E. Boman, of Fremont, King county	50 00
H. A. Towner, of Willipa, Pacific county	50 00
Jacob Drissler ($30 more pledged)	20 00
John Grownow, of Seattle, King county	10 00

There is great need of a very large amount of work being performed by our field secretary, and corresponding need for friends of the cause to be enroled in the above honorary list.

SEMI-ANNUAL DUES OF THE WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION.

This reminds me that the semi-annual dues, $1, payable in advance, are overdue from all members whose certificates are dated good up to July 29, 1891. Examin the date of your certificate and save piling additional work on your already overtaxed secretary.

By the way, dear reader, what is your real opinion of persons, residents of our state of Washington, who claim to be Liberals, and not alone admit the facts, but themselvs boast of the good work that has been accomplished by the Washington Secular Union, yet fail to join or to contribute the small pittance of $1 each six months toward payment of outlay incurred? Like the old Methodist deacon, what they giv "is nothing to nobody." Would it not be better for the cause if, like that deacon, they had shuffled off this mortal coil? What are they but miserable parasites, unsightly barnacles impeding the good ship's progress?

The bigotry of the fanatic is hardly more contemptible than the cautious selfishness of the man who silently enjoys the sweet air of freedom while thousands of his brethren sicken in the dungeons of superstition, and he too miserably mean to contribute even $1 to secure their deliverance.

GRAND JUBILEE AT NOOKSACK CROSSING, WHATCOM COUNTY.

Our ever-vigilant and efficient co-worker, Vice-President D. E. Rice, the little giant Infidel of Whatcom county, determined to impress the victory won by abolishing religious exercises in the public school at Nooksack Crossing by lectures and a grand festival. So Mrs. Reynolds was engaged to deliver lectures on "Sunday Laws" and "The Bible in Our Public Schools," thus increasing the interest and enforcing attention to the justice of our demands on these two great and important issues. The lectures were well attended and received with eager interest.

After the second lecture (Friday evening, August 7th), there was a grand ball and supper; forty tickets at $1 25 each were sold. This was the largest and most enjoyable festival ever held in that district. The sumptuous supper was prepared and presided over by those queens of the cuisine, Mrs. D. E. and Miss Jessie Rice. In that section of the country all eulogy of the supper is superfluous, for once it is announced that they will attend to the refreshment department and excellence and abundance are a foregone conclusion.

The music was A No. 1, furnished by the Ten-mile String Band. Dancing was continued with unabated fervor till broad daylight; not by the light of the moon, but in the full effulgence of old Sol's bright smiles, "the boys went home with the girls in the morning."

It was a wonderfully enjoyable time. Old and young, all were happy. Even the most rabid bigots admitted it was a brilliant success, unequaled ever before in that section. One good lady declared "them Infiddlers allers get the best on it, especially when that old Infiddle Rice takes the management. Never knew him fail in anything he sot his mind on. Easy enough to account for it. The devil is always good to his own."

"Mac," the generous, jovial ferryman, one of the kindest-hearted but most outspoken and fearless Liberals of the state, donated over $20 worth of ferry tolls to those attending the lectures from the other side of the Nooksack river.

LECTURES AND DEBATE AT SUMAS CITY.

Sumas City is a very rapidly growing incorporated city, situated in a rich and fertil valley on the international boundary line, already the terminus of four great railroads and more to follow, settled with public-spirited, energetic, intelligent people; a live town; wide-awake, enterprising merchants; two newspapers—one, the International Vidette, admirably edited, a nineteenth-century paper fully up to to the times, a worthy representativ of the flourishing young city.

Under the management of that bright young business man and genuin Liberal, J. E. Leader, arrangements were made for two lectures by Mrs. Reynolds, which awoke very great interest and a discussion between Rev. E. H. Carman and myself.

The following editorial will best tell the story of the debate:

The debate on Monday night between C. B. Reynolds, of Seattle, and Rev. E. H. Carman, of Nooksack, called out the largest crowd the hall has ever held. All came expecting to hear something interesting and all went home satisfied that they had heard it. The subject of discussion was, Resolved, That there is a standard of truth in the world apart from the Bible, Mr. Reynolds taking the affirmativ and Mr. Carman the negativ. The most kindly feeling was evinced by both gentlemen, each extending to the other every courtesy of parliamentary usage in debates.

Mr. Carman stated in substance that he was not there for the purpose of substantiating the truth of the Bible, but called upon his learned opponent to show that a standard of truth existed in the world apart from the Bible and on this point virtually rested his case. Mr. Reynolds then called the attention of the audience to the unchangeable laws of nature, and in a beautiful word-picture likened them to the sturdy oak, unchangeable in all things, and casting from it each year its dead leaves, as old, lifeless, and exploded creeds are cast aside by the march of reason, education, and civilization.

In showing that the Bible was in no way a standard of truth, Mr. Reynolds called the attention of the audience to the fact (offering to produce evidence from the Bible itself) that no crime was ever committed by man that has not been indorsed and justified by the God of holy writ.

Mr. Carman in reply stated that the laws of nature were more harsh and unjust than those laid down in the Bible, using as an illustration of their inexorable harshness the loss of a ship at sea that carried down to a watery grave innocent men, women, and children. He also illustrated the same point by referring to the cyclone that sweeps over vast districts, carrying death and destruction in its path; that no relief is given by the God of nature.

Mr. Reynolds asked when he came to reply to this argument where was the God of revelation when the ship was tossed on the mighty deep, and when the waves dashed over the sinking wreck, and loving Christian parents, brothers, and sisters on the shore were praying to the Christian God for the loved ones on the deep, and claimed that if the Bible were true their God would hear and answer their prayers and in the moment of their supreme distress come to their relief. He did not claim that the laws of nature could be averted, but claimed they were fixed and unchangeable, and if they were violated punishment, crime, and death is the inevitable result. That their laws are proclaimed in the trees of the forests, in the babbling brook, the shining stars, and rock and earth, and that from these we are taught to advance and promote the happiness of others, and by so doing we secure our own happiness on this earth, and procure for ourselvs a crown of glory in eternity, if eternity there be.

Mr. Reynolds was frequently interrupted by applause and all evinced a hearty appreciation of the discussion.—International Vidette, Aug. 13, 1891.

C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. Wash. Sec. Union.

Fremont, Wash.

With the Workers for Our Cause.

News and Notes.

The first place I strike on my route from the East to the West is Linesville, Pa. For many years the fires of Freethought hav been blazing here. It has been quite a center for Liberalism. A number of the old guard hav gone away to different parts of the country—but enough remain to keep the hearth-fire of freedom alive. D. C. Thayer, nearly ninety years of age, has still the generous enthusiasm of youth. He is in the front rank. Comrade Wallace also joins in. Mr. Baldwin, of Liberal, Mo., whose name is indissolubly linked with the old-time campaigns of the past—a redoubtable leader—was fortunately present with the same good cheer as ever. I gave one lecture at Linesville on the "Religious Conspiracy," and the attendance was fair. It was a pleasure to greet the stanch supporters of Freethought here, who hav made the name of Linesville so renowned in the Liberal ranks.

On Friday, August 14th, A. Brooks, of the veteran corps, who has been a subscriber of the Investigator for more than a quarter of a century, takes me with his own team in the bright sunshine of this summer's day to Andover, O., across the line ten miles distant. By railroad one must travel about thirty miles to reach the same point, via Jamestown, or "Jimtown," as they call it in this section, a somewhat gloomy orthodox place I understand. Just before reaching Andover we make a call on the Liberal household of E. D. Fenkell, where THE TRUTH SEEKER sheds its genial rays.

Andover is a pretty and quiet village. Mr. J. W. Roberts takes care of us at this point. There are only a few outspoken Liberals here, but the churches do not prosper. In fact, there is a general indifference. Not a great many were at the lecture, but I hav faith that something will be accomplished in the future. Mr. Roberts and family were born into the Liberal ranks, and giv cordial welcome and help to the Secular pilgrim, and so hope still shines on the toilsome path.

Saturday morning, August 15th, I take the train for Farmdale, about ten miles off. Here I feel at home. No church spires are in sight, but Root's Hall illuminates the way. I enjoy the hospitality of Henry Root and family. Saturday evening I lecture at Gustavus. Not quite so many are present as at the first lecture, for this reason, the churches had come together and passed a resolution that their members had better stay away, and one church declared excommunication against those who did attend the lecture. But the flag flies still, and Gustavus is in the ranks of progress. Comrades Barber, Smith, Shelden, Shipman, and Forbes will keep things on the move.

Sunday afternoon and Sunday evening I lecture at Root's Hall to full houses. The audience is quite representativ. Friends from a distance are present—the Brockways, whose name is well known in the Liberal world, the Thompsons and Call from the "Ridges," J. W. Roberts and family from Andover, and Robert Brown and Richard Webb, who hail from Sodom, O., close by Church Hill, a somewhat luminous association. Our friends came from Sodom on purpose to hear the lecture, and I shall return the compliment next year and lecture at Sodom or rather at the neighboring railroad station, Hubbard, where Remsburg, I believe, has broken ground. Sodom is the name of the post-office. I do not know whether Lot's wife is anywhere in the vicinity or not, but I reckon there is plenty of "the salt of the earth."

The Henrys, as usual, furnished excellent music for the meetings. They put the soul of Liberalism into the beautiful strains.

I was pleased to meet with J. S. Pelton, of Burg Hill, O., and hav a cordial invitation to lecture there on my next round.

The Christians of Orangeville, O., put their heads together, and no hall or place of meeting could be had for love or money, and so I was obliged to forego the pleasure of meeting our Liberal friends there.

I cannot enumerate all the troops of friends I met at Farmdale and vicinity. I feel sure that Freethought has come to stay in this handsome little village. I hav a glimpse of Chicago Liberals as I pass through—E. A. Stevens and family, Mr. and Mrs. A. D. O'Neil, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Robertson, Dr. Bishop, Mrs. Hewitt, and others. I had a couple of holidays, and went to the races. It was delightful to see the horses spin around the vast circle. Magnificent animals they are. When they reach the home-stretch ten thousand people watch the flying feet, and thunderous applause greets the successful racer. It is a moment of splendid excitement, and the swift steeds partake of the exhilarating joy.

Dr. Bishop has enrolled himself in the ranks of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He rather thinks that I will some day see the truth of Spiritualism. He himself has experienced many interesting phases of the "occult power." I am willing to learn, but I expect I was born to be upon the "other side." I am pretty sure that the doctor could cure my body, but I am not so sure that he could change my mind.

From Chicago I come on to Minneapolis, and arrive there Sunday afternoon. I lecture in the evening to a fair audience. Evidently, there is a large Liberal element in Minneapolis. S. G. Cooper, of THE TRUTH SEEKER ranks, contributes to our work here. J. H. Heisser, of the Liberal Publishing Company of Minneapolis, is helping to spread the light with Liberal sermons, etc.

Monday I make a visit with Mr. John Maddock and Chas. Lownd to Pillsbury's big mill, and it is a marvel of magnificent and enormous machinery. It is the largest mill in the world, and from top to bottom everything moves like clockwork, as if the machines themselvs were endowed with thought. It was a great thing when, twenty years ago, Pillsbury built a mill with a capacity of two hundred barrels per day. But this mill produces 7,000 barrels in the same time. Think of 7,000 barrels of flour coming every day from this gigantic structure that towers to the skies! When I think of the old grist-mill by the little stream, working patiently day by day, among the hills and staid people of New England, I am astonished when I behold these shining ranks on ranks of glittering and busy wheels that from the teeming fields of earth, with accurate motion, make the snow-white flour, almost like a cloud on a summer sky, float forth in radiant splendor. It is a display of human genius that makes poetical the march of progress. It might, indeed, be called the "Eighth wonder of the world," this stony palace of industry called "Mill A." It grinds 9,500,000 bushels of wheat yearly. There are besides this mill four other mills of the Pillsbury-Washburn Co., the daily capacity of which, with Mill A, is 14,000 barrels. Three hundred cars are required daily to take wheat into and flour out of these five great mills, and they could feed two cities as large as New York. Charlie Pillsbury, as they call him, because they all like him, is a "captain of industry," and has been a notable factor in the growth of this wonderful city. He gives to all his employees a per centage of the profits made, and is both generous and just in the management of his prodigious enterprises. I remember him as a "Dartmouth boy," thirty years ago, and so this vast metropolis, so new, amazing, and splendid in its advance, is mingled with memories of sweet New England, its green fields and mighty hills, and the classic shades where dreamy and exultant youth quaffed the fountains of knowledge. Well, the reality, after all, in the dust and turmoil of years, has something of romance.

Monday evening I visit St. Paul, and enjoy the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. John Monroe and Wm. Rodger, who are stanch Liberals. Rodger does a business of three hundred thousand dollars a year, steam-heating, etc., and the churches patronize him, and the Catholic institutions, who need a little warmth in this world whatever they may desire for the next—and yet he is a pronounced Infidel. It is found, however, that he does good work, and Christians appreciate this, and are willing to pay and ask no questions as to one's creed.

Tuesday I go south to Waterville, about sixty miles from Minneapolis. I find a splendid company of Liberals here. I giv three lectures. The opera-house is filled every night, and on the last night, Thursday, August 27th, every seat is occupied, although the churches hav two meetings in opposition. However, several ministers attend the lectures. Geo. H. Dawes and Remsburg hav been here before and sown the seed, and the harvest is coming. On Wednesday evening, at my second lecture, Dr. Edgar Cowles aided me with a delightful recitation of Ingersoll's beautiful prose-poem, "Life," which was received by the audience with rapt attention.

George R. Cowles is our wheel-horse at Waterville. It was by his decided efforts that the lectures were given, and that such success attended them. However, he is not alone. The Brossards, Durand, Alexander Hunt, Chubb and Aldrich of Morristown, and others aided generously in the campaign. Waterville has about 1,200 inhabitants. There is a beautiful country about it, forest, field, and shining lakes. There are factories established, and Waterville promises to be a thriving place.

I certainly hav not had a more delightful time than here. Liberalism is in the air, and moves on to triumph.

I return to Minneapolis on Friday, August 28th, under the guidance of Chas. Lownd and Leroy Berrier. I hav a trip about the city, view its elegant streets, vast business blocks, drive over its boulevards, behold its pavilions, parks, lakes, with magnificent prospects. I watch the operation of the prodigious lumber mills, which like huge leviathans toil and thunder with a kind of startling intelligence, dragging the logs from the river, which, almost without the touch of a human hand, are made into smooth boards and ready for transportation within five minutes after tumbling from the waters.

Friday night I spend at the rural home of John Maddock, within the city limits but quiet and retired as if in the bosom of the country. Mr. Maddock is an enthusiastic philosopher, and his writings in the Open Court are well known. He believes in the gospel of evolution. He has been in almost every part of the world. He has studied nature and humanity from many points of observation. He has no faith in religion. He has a pleasant family, wife and children, and my stay in his home was most enjoyable. Life, however, is mingled with death. Only a few months ago his daughter Nellie, aged fourteen years, died, a bright and beautiful child, a lover of flowers and music, in whom was the spirit of youth and joy. All loved her, and her loss is deeply felt, but sorrow is crowned with memory's beauty, and death becomes a soft and tender light. Unforgotten is her buoyant enthusiasm, her voice of song, her generous and noble disposition.

I lecture on Sunday afternoon at St. Paul, at New Market Hall. I do not hav a large audience, but I do hav a most appreciativ one. I believe that Liberalism can maintain a commanding position in this city. It has some stanch supporters, who are willing to do pioneer service.

In the evening Century Hall at Minneapolis presents a larger audience than on the previous Sunday. Good reports of the lectures are published in the Minneapolis and St. Paul papers. On the whole, the Liberal outlook is encouraging.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Bennett entertain me at their home on Saturday and Sunday. Mr. Bennett has been in this country ever since 1853. He has witnessed the beginning and growth of Minneapolis. He has always been a Liberal, and is not afraid to say so.

Leroy Berrier, chairman of our meetings, is an able and pronounced Radical. He was formerly in the Unitarian church, but did not find that sufficiently broad for his intellectual sympathies. He accepts the universe of facts. In many ways, in literary and sociable clubs, he is exercising an educational influence upon the scholars and thinkers of this place, and bringing them to the front of reform. I was pleased to meet with Geo. Davis, who does a good deal of thinking on his own account, and has written an excellent article on the origin of life.

I must thank Mr. Charles Lownd and Frank W. Greaves and brother for their assistance in the work here, and cordial greetings.

Rev. Mr. Sample of the Universalist church and Rev. Mr. Simmons of the Unitarian church are scholarly and Liberal men, and some of their sermons touch the key-note of advanced thought. Essentially they are with Liberalism. They are almost free from theology and stand for Liberty.

There is a broad outlook every way at Minneapolis and St. Paul. I hav met many friends, and I hav bright hopes of future work here and in the vicinity.

I was fortunate to meet Victor G. Pickett, of Albert Lea, a young and earnest Liberal, and on my next trip arrangements will be made for lectures at Albert Lea.

J. F. Macomber watches the stars, and believes that in their bright beams he can read the tangled destinies of man, but he is clear-headed for this world and stands by the Secular flag.

I visited the Exposition on Saturday night. There is a wonderful display of the riches of the Northwest, its bounteous harvests, mingled with the splendors of art, the unique remains of the cliff-dwellers in ancient and melancholy state, and vast and various exhibitions beautiful and glowing in the brilliant light, with the animated strains of the renowned Mexican band. Jordan Is a Hard Road to Travel.

Among the numerous and uncertain paths and guides encountered by a traveler bound for the New Jerusalem, what is more natural than that he should get lost?

Having been misdirected by guide-boards, fooled by clerks and ticket agents, deceived by conductors and lying prophets, and humbugged by the superintendent himself, fortunate indeed is he who does not fall by the wayside and perish in despair.

To all who contemplate starting upon a journey to this promised city we extend a warning, which may well be used as a preface to the guide-books, and remembered especially when following any of the guides.

Mayor Jehovah, who is also superintendent of all roads leading to this desirable metropolis, has himself followed the guide business to some extent, but owing to his mirthful nature and his great love of practical jokes, has proved himself not only a very unprofitable guide, but a very tricky one.

We base this conclusion upon the unquestioned testimony of those who hav followed him part way on the road, as well as upon the confessions of the mayor himself.

He plagued old Pharaoh in numerous ways for a long time, until he got tired of that kind of fun; then he started off with a party of the old king's servants, whom he undertook to guide through the woods into a land which he promised to giv them, but after fooling with them for forty years, he got tired of that also. He did not giv them the land, and openly avowed his breach of promis (Num. xiv. 34).

Next, he got after Job, and with the help of another fellow, worried the poor old man until he lost his head and asked them if they had not poured him out like milk and curdled him like a cheese (Job x, 10).

Was this because Job was bad? No. The mayor frankly admitted that he was perfect and upright, and that there was no better man in the world than he (Job ii, 3).

No, it was just for the fun that was in it, and they kept on until the poor fellow declared that he had escaped by the skin of his teeth (Job xix, 20), but so sore that he cursed the day of his birth (Job iii).

Let the prospectiv excursionist ponder well over the trials and tribulations of Job and Jeremiah. Hear the latter's first wail upon discovering that he was being duped, as he cried:

"Oh Lord God! Surely thou hast greatly deceived this people" (Jer. iv, 10). But, struggling onward with great effort, he soon finds that he is the victim of a new dodge, and comes out second best, and once more he cries: "Oh Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived" (Jer. xx, 7).

The poor fellow persevered, however, with considerable zeal and patience, notwithstanding the tricks that were played upon him, until they became too many for him. It was, no doubt, fun for the mayor, but not for Jerry, and his "dander" began to rise as he called out: "Oh Lord, . . . I sat alone because of thy hand; for thou hast filled me with indignation. Why is my pain perpetual and my wound incurable, which refuseth to be healed? Wilt thou be altogether unto me as a liar, and as waters that fail?" (Jer. xv, 17, 18).

And did he reach the New Jerusalem? We do not know. Poor old Jerry did not hav a special train chartered for his benefit, but was evidently going it afoot, trying to follow the lead of his tricky guide, and when lamenting over his troubles he said:

"He hath led me and brought me into darkness, but not into light. Surely against me he is turned; he turneth his hand against me all the day.

"My flesh and my skin he hath made old. He hath broken my bones.

"He hath builded against me and compassed me with gall and travail.

"He hath set me in dark places, as they that be dead of old.

"He hath hedged me about that I cannot get out, he hath made my chain heavy.

"Also when I cry and shout, he shutteth out my prayer.

"He hath inclosed my way with hewn stone, he hath made my paths crooked.

"He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, and a lion in secret places.

"He hath turned aside my ways and pulled me in pieces. He hath made me desolate.

"He hath bent his bow, and set me as a mark for the arrow. He hath caused the arrows of his quiver to enter my veins.

"I was a derision to all my people and their song all the day.

"He hath filled me with bitterness, he hath made me drunken with wormwood.

"He hath also broken my teeth with gravel-stones, he hath covered me with ashes.

"And thou hast removed my soul far off from peace. I forgot prosperity. and I said: My strength and my hope is perished from the Lord" (Lam. iii, 2–18).

And did he reach the promised city? Once more we do not know. To hav arrived there would hav been a small return for the tribulation he had suffered at the hands of his guide, but it seems most probable that he failed to get there, for his last words are a wail of despair: "Wherefore didst thou forget us forever? . . . But thou hast utterly rejected us" (Lam. v, 20, 22).

After a while business got too heavy for the superintendent to giv his personal attention to all of it, so he had to get a lot of clerks to assist him. He called them prophets. These might possibly hav been of some use to travelers had they been left to themselvs, but that was not in accordance with the plans of the boss. He must hav some fun. Plaguing to death, pouring Job out and churning him, firing gravel-stones at Jerry's teeth, and dumping ashes on him when he was not looking, did very well while they lasted, but something else was needed, so he got his prophets to work and the first thing he did was to put a lying spirit in all their mouths (1 Kings xxii, 23; 2 Chron. xviii, 22). Perhaps these prophets were honest and did not know that the superintendent was going to come such a game as that on them, much less did the poor unsuspecting travelers know it, and it got them into a good many bad scrapes.

The old fellow enjoyed this until he began to hanker after something new, when he owned up like a man that he had deceived the prophets, causing them to lie to the emigrants, who, consequently, missed their way (Ezek. xiv, 9).

We are nearly through with the mayor, but having set out to warn prospectiv visitors to the New Jerusalem against these tricky, joke-loving guides, we cannot desist until we hav mentioned two more.

Shortly after the mayor had confessed the pranks he had played, he took a fancy to a young girl, and —well, it's the old story.

He was a precocious youngster, born among the oxen, but that did not daunt him, for at the age of twelve years he got into a wrangle with a lot of doctors and convinced them that he knew a thing or two (Luke ii, 46).

After that he had not much to say or to do for several years, but judging from what occurred later, he was using his time hatching schemes and planning jokes, for he had said that he would follow his father's business (Luke ii, 49).

He was a chip of the old block, and like many other young bloods, was determined to outdo the old man at all hazards.

When he started out as a guide, one of the first things he did was to get a dozen fishermen about him and show them the inside of his game, informing them that the old man had given him full swing (Matt. xxviii, 18; John iii, 35; v, 22), and that he was going to lead all travelers over the best route to the promised city. He would show them ways that the old man never knew, and all who refused to follow his lead would get the worst of it in the end.

The old mayor had contented himself with playing pranks upon all whom he undertook to guide, but the youngster got ahead of him in that, by declaring that he would chuck them heels over head into a red-hot kettle of brimstone if they did not mind their eyes (Luke xii, 5), and without mentioning the old man's name, he gave him another rub by informing his followers that no man had ever yet reached the promised city (John iii, 13).

Just how the old mayor relished this piece of presumption on the part of his young hopeful, we are not informed, but no doubt he winked at it; at any rate, he never raised any rumpus about it.

We pass hastily over the career of this upstart as a guide. He kept his word by leading all travelers by a long roundabout way, although he said it was straight and narrow. He showed them many paths to be followed, many others to be avoided, all of which will be found in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 19, 1890.

He fooled them in every imaginable way, throwing them off the track whenever he could, and more than once privately confessed to the twelve that he was purposely misleading them, and had no intention of taking them to the New Jerusalem (Mark iv, 12; John xii, 40; Acts xxviii, 26, 27). Retribution finally overtook him, however, and he came to grief.

A lot of travelers who preferred the lead of the old superintendent with all his tricks to that of the youngster, seized the latter and raised him on a pole after the manner in vogue with criminals at the time, after which they put him into a hole in the ground, from which he afterward escaped. But he did not undertake any more guiding, and did not hang around there very long. Recent experience had taught him that it was not safe, so he skedaddled off to his daddy.

The next and last against whom we would warn you, although tricky enough, was not equal to the mayor or his son, but he could lie with anyone.

Part of the time he credited his lies to the mayor (2 Thess. ii, 11; 2 Tim. iii, 16), but generally took them all upon himself (2 Cor. xi, 17; xii, 16; Rom. iii, 7).

But in spite of his tricks and lies, he has had a much greater following than either of the others. But just what number hav reached their destination through his guidance, we are not informed.

The worst is that we must believe everything these fellows tell us, although we know they often lie, or be chucked into the pot of brimstone. One says that popularity is a good thing (Eccl. vii, 1; Prov. xxii, 1); another that it is a bad thing (Luke vi, 26). The fellow who does not believe both is an Infidel, while he who does believe both is a—well, we hav our opinion of him.

Weary traveler, beware. Many hav gone (as is supposed) to the new Jerusalem, but not one has ever returned. The way is even now infested by thousands of reverend and holy guides, who, like the mayor, are full of lies, but unlike him, are too dishonest to own it. Beware of them.

Lectures and Meetings.

IT is a long journey across the three great states of Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana, from Nebraska to Ohio—nearly seven hundred miles. Council Bluffs, Ia., is just across the Missouri river from Nebraska, and Ft. Wayne, Ind., is but a few miles from the western boundary of Ohio. Thursday night, August 27th, J. E. Remsburg lectured in Council Bluffs, and on the following night in Ft. Wayne. He remained in Council Bluffs over an hour after delivering his lecture and stopped nearly three hours in Chicago.

S. P. PUTNAM'S lecture appointments for September and October are as follows: Colville, Wash., September 12th, 13th; Spangle, Wash., 15th; Rosalia, Wash., 16th, 17th; Oakesdale, Wash., 18th; Palouse City, Wash., 19th, 20th; Pasco, Wash., 22d, 23d; Nanaimo, B. C., 26th; Wellington, B.C., 27th, 28th; Snohomish, Wash., 30th; Portland convention, October 3d, 4th, 5th; Grant's Pass, 7th, 8th; San Francisco, 11th. Will lecture in California through the months of October, November, December, and January, state convention January 29th.

Who is Responsible?

In view of the vast amount of sorrow and suffering in life from various causes, known and unknown, that exist in the world, and that seem to exert a baneful influence not only on mankind but on all animal and vegetable life, may we not well ask the question, why is it? what is the cause? or from what does it emanate?

If, as we are taught and a majority of our people profess to believe, "God doeth all things, and doeth all things well," then the theory that "whatever is is right" must be true, because it cannot be refuted.

Are we then to conclude that there is no wrong and that everything that causes sickness, sorrow, pain, and death is for the best, because it emanates from a creator infinitly wise and good? It cannot be otherwise if we admit that God does all things, and that he is infinit in all his attributes of omniscience, power, wisdom, and goodness. But our friends who claim the Bible to be God's infallible, inspired word and law for the guidance of mankind, will say: We are free moral agents. God created man perfect, but made him a responsible being; while he made him with power to act as he chose, he told him what he should not do as well as what he might do.

"And the Lord God commanded the man saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." But our Bible readers will remember that at the time this command was given, not to eat of the tree of knowledge, the woman, on whom the curse seems to hav fallen with most severity and who is generally considered most to blame, was not "made;" the rib had not yet been taken from Adam's side and the flesh closed up, therefore she could not hav heard the command as originally given; and whether she had been informed of it privately, either by the Lord or Adam, or if she had any knowledge of it except that given by "the father of liars"—the serpent—when he said: "Yea, hath God said, ye shall not eat of every tree in the garden, etc.," we are not informed. But we are told that "she saw the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes and a tree to be desired to make one wise."

What wonder then that she should partake of it? God created the tree and its fruit, caused it to "appear pleasant and to be desired," placed it in the midst of the garden where it would most attract the attention. And what for? Did he not know that it would be a source of temptation that they would not be able to resist? Of course he knew all this, if his infinit omniscience enabled him to see and know all things from before the beginning. Our Christian friends will say this was done to teach mankind their responsibility, to teach them that, although free agents, there are penalties for violating express commands.

This might be sound reasoning if applied to man as a creator, with all his imperfections and lack of omniscience and foreknowledge, but when applied to infinit deity, to whom all things are ever present, in whose sight all things are as one eternal now, it would seem he should hav done differently, because he knew what the result would be.

If a maker or creator does the best his knowledge or power enables him to do, no responsibility should rest if the outcome does not appear to be perfect, or as good as might be wished. But when a creator is infinit in all the attributes necessary to perfection, if there is anything wrong or imperfect the responsibility should rest with the author.

In this view of the subject, if the Bible really is the inspired word of a good creator, its teachings should be perfect and harmonious, and all things, past, present, and future, be without fault or blemish; in fact, the doctrin that "whatever is is right" should not be questioned. Then does it not behoove our Christian friends to stop talking and preaching against the crime, wrong, and sin of every kind that pervades and afflicts the world?

Our Christian clergy teach, and most of their followers believe, that the Bible is the bulwark of civilization; that were it not for the knowledge derived therefrom mankind would be in the lowest state of barbarism, but little above the brute.

I remember often to hav heard that assertion in my childhood, but not as often in later years, because science has done and is doing much to remove the dark pall in which by the aid of priestcraft, bigotry, and superstition the world has been so long enthralled.

Yes, the clergy for their own selfish ends would hav us believe the Bible to be a perfect, infallible moral guide, but they must be allowed to explain and expound it. A part of them would compel its introduction into our public schools as a text-book, notwithstanding it contains many passages so obscene that any other publication containing similar language would not be allowed to pass through the United States mails.

I cannot accept the Bible as a true, wise, and, just book when we consider the account of the creation; the fall; the flood; God's chosen people, the Jews, and his dealings with them; the plan of redemption to save all mankind, according to the answer given by Christ when asked the question, "Lord are there few that be saved?" and he answered, "Strait is the gate and narrow the way that leadeth to life and few there be that find it; while broad is the road that leadeth to destruction and many there be that go in thereat."

Let us giv a few thoughts to this subject in view of the Bible as a text-book in our schools.

We will suppose the teacher to commence with Genesis and go through as with other books.

The legitimate teaching would be, that God created the world and pronounced everything very good; that he placed the first pair of human beings in a fine place, told them that everything was theirs for enjoyment except the fruit of one conspicuous tree whose fruit was very enticing—that was forbidden in order to teach them that although they were free agents they were responsible for their acts.

He knew before the first act of creation that they would not be able to withstand the temptation, and that "by Adam's fall we sinned all;" that unhappiness in this life and eternal punishment in a future existence would be the fate of a vast majority of the many millions that he would thrust into existence without their knowledge or consent, and then remove at his pleasure, the few to sing endless praises to him, and the many to wail eternally—"where the smoke of their torment ascendeth forever and ever." A God who could make and consummate such a plan could hardly be called wise and good. It would be the duty of each teacher to carry his pupils through the book and teach them in like manner the whole story, or the many prodigious stories—bad as well as good, obscene as well as moral—and the final great failure to save, by giving the third part of deity as an atoning sacrifice to save all with the result that only a "few" escape eternal punishment. Can we imagin a greater and more terrible failure!!

It does not mend the matter to say God provided a way by which all might be saved, because he knew before the beginning what the result would be, and as he had the power, if he were just and good, seeing, as with his omniscient eye he could, the great awful panorama of millions in hell, he would hav said, "That is a bad picture; being infinit in power, I can do better, and better it shall be."

A little illustration of this principle of temptation and fall for teachers to giv their pupils may not be out of place. To carry out the simile, in the schoolroom should be placed a picture beautiful to look upon, but containing the most deadly poison. Tell the pupils they might enjoy all but this; but that most beautiful, enticing thing of all must not be looked upon, for in the day thou dost that thou shalt die.

And the teacher must know the command would not be obeyed; a subtle emissary must also be present to tell them what the teacher said is not true, but looking on that picture would make them wise; and as they are there to get wisdom, of course the picture would be noticed before all else. Would such a theory be deemed wise? In view of this, is it not pertinent to ask, who is responsible? If that were the better way, then liquor-dealers, keepers of houses of ill fame, everything that tempts to vice and crime, should be encouraged. So that all may know they are free agents, and must resist everything that seems beautiful and good if they hav been told it is bad; if they do not, eternal torment is sure.

Money.

I find a very interesting article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 25th, by J. G. Hertwig, headed "A Correct Silver Dollar."

He proposes to make silver coin, equal in value to the bullion of which it is composed.

I criticise the article only as to the time of its appearance. The first important thing, as it seems to me, is to devise a system of currency adapted to the use of distributing, on equal terms, all labor products to the actual workers who hav coöperated in creating them. It may be thought impertinent in me to say that I do not believe one person in a hundred, except scholars, clearly understands the correct application of the word money.

I will giv a case to illustrate my meaning. A few years ago we had in circulation a silver coin, used as money, and called a trade dollar. On a certain day the papers reported that it had been demonetized, and the bullion could be sold at the mint for eighty-five cents for each coin. A friend of mine, before getting the news, went to the store for his supplies, and offered in payment what the people had always called money. He was told it was not money but only bullion. Flushed with surprise and indignation at such rude treatment (there were several persons present), he offered ninety cents apiece for all the crowd could furnish. It was not long after he had bought his silver bullion before he found out how he had been deceived by the word money. The people had always been taught that the word implied a material substance. How can the government, they ask, coin it if it is not material? They don't do it, they only say it, to pull wool over your eyes and mine. They coin silver, and it may lie in the mint, or out of it, forty years, without sustaining the relation the word money implies. I will refer to Hebrew history to show how the word was used three thousand years ago. Ex. xxi, 21: "If a man smite his servant with a rod and he die under his hand, he shall be punished, but if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished, for he is his money." In discussing the question of money, slavery, bondage, etc. (synonymous terms), the institution itself must be dealt with, for without that monster, under some title, the relation of money or slavery could no more exist than the poison of a serpent after his fangs were removed. Many years ago, when John Wesley said, "American slavery is the sum of all villainies," he denounced the same wicked institution that St. Paul did when he said, "The love of money is the root of all evil;" and to-day, in our so-called land of liberty, we hav a system of wage-slavery that in some respects is worse than the old system of chattel slavery that the demands of an enlightened humanity called upon us to destroy. But I hav not yet come to the worst feature of the trade-dollar trick. There was said to be six million trade dollars in circulation which the fiat of law had demonetized to six million pieces of bullion, worth eighty-five cents apiece, which could be sold at the mint on presentation. This was inconvenient for the common people to do, and they sold them to speculators on the same terms. When it was brought up, then it was reported that Congress again had uttered its fiat—not to coin money, that it could not do—but to remonetize six million pieces of silver coin, which it had previously both monetized and demonetized. This was done to allow the rich speculators to return it and receive one hundred cents for each full-weight legal silver dollar. Mind you, it is good sound money now in this stage of its plundering process. A year, more or less, had passed when report, true or false, uttered its voice again to the effect that Senator Stewart of Nevada had publicly announced that there was not one line of legal authority to sanction this public swindle, which took $900,000 from the pockets of the poor and gave it to the rich. Whether this statement is true or not, the people were plundered by this transaction all the same; and who is responsible for it?

The institution of money is the product of a barbarous age and people, when the normal state of society demanded that the few should hold the many in bondage on condition of treating them humanely if they obeyed their masters. But if the bondmen were rebellious, they could be killed outright by sanction of law, if the act was not performed too suddenly. That condition of society has now potentially (not actually) passed away, and our chaos of social disorder comes almost entirely from our persistent willingness to be governed and controled by the laws and institutions of an ignorant and barbarous age and race. The time has passed for an enlightened and rational people to be any longer restrained from living and acting in accordance with the dictates of common sense, justice, and reason. With this conviction, the people, not only of our own nation, but throughout the civilized world, are in unison.

It would be a very great step toward emancipating man from industrial bondage if the institution of money were abolished within free nations. It is in order still among all barbarous nations, and will be until they can arise from a state of bondage to one of freedom, and as long as we are controled by their institutions we must be compelled to suffer their fate.

Now let me giv my ideas of an institution whose practical working would meet the demands of the people of a free and enlightened nation. As it is self-evident that the life, health, and happiness of every man on earth depend upon the constant use of the natural elements, and that they can be procured only by man's labor, therefore, justice and reason demand that equal opportunities be given to every adult man to render equal service in the production of wealth, and equal compensation be rendered to every man for equal service given. Since the dawn of history the men of labor hav been controled by the men of leisure, and they were industrially related to each other as tyrant and slave, and the word money was the ideal symbol of that relation.

Now let us hav a word to symbolize the idea of service for service among all men, on equal terms of compensation, and I propose the following word, Manri (man redeemed) This word is meant to characterize the industrial state or condition of free men, as the word money does the state or condition of bondmen.

Money—men who, with all the results of their labor, are held in bondage to a master. Manri—men redeemed, and absolute owners of all the fruits of their toil.

The word money to-day is meant to indicate only the current coin used as symbols, through which to accumulate the partially paid labor products of both wage and chattel slaves, and whoever owns a man's labor products, without giving him an equitable compensation therefor, practically owns the man.

I hav in part named the currency I propose, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 3d. Entire it is as follows: The word money implies dollars, dimes, cents, and mills. The word mauri implies dolers, dimets, cenets, and milets.

The word doler I use to signify one day's labor. It is symbolized by a paper note similar in form to a one dollar note. A dimet signifies one-tenth of a day's labor, a cenet one-hundreth, and a milet one-thousandth of a day's labor, all in the form of paper notes suitably inscribed. The system of currency herein presented is intended to answer the demands of the people of a free nation in distributing wealth among its actual producers. The symbols called money are well adapted for international use in exchanging home for foreign products, but for home use money symbols hav always held the people in bondage and always will.

Therefore I invite my friend Hertwig to coöperate with me in introducing a system of currency that will, on equal terms, distribute the nation's wealth among the nation's people who hav coöperated in its production; and when under this condition of things wealth should greatly accumulate in the hands of the people, then the approved international currency would be in order to use in trading with the barbarians of India, and what we could not get of them in exchange for our commodities we might buy of them with our "correct" silver dollar.

In the August Arena Mr. Hassell has contributed a very interesting article headed, "The Independent Party, and Money at Cost." Now, money always has and always must cost the perpetual bondage of the working people. Without bondage there could be no money. Money and bondage both imply a condition of slavery. WM. U. DAME.

Money and the Mechanism of Exchange.

Money and the mechanism of exchange is a science with principles just as fixed and definit as the rules of arithmetic. But this science has never been taught in our schools, and since it has become a subject of public agitation the ignorance of the people and their would-be leaders in this science is simply astonishing. Colonel Ingersoll saw the people running after candle flies, and he threw his headlight upon the field, which obscured the light of the candle-flies. Now they are buzzing like mad hornets and trying to lead the people with noise, as they cannot show their lights.

SOME MONEY QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

On page 503, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 8th, under the head of "Cash," Mr. W. P. Brooks put a series of questions to Mr. J. G. Hertwig, which I desire to answer, expecting Mr. Hertwig's response to precede mine by one or two weeks.

MONEY CATECHISM

1. "What is money?" Ans. Coined metal. The government stamp upon a coin is a voucher for the quantity and quality of the metal contained in the coin. If individuals and private corporations were allowed to coin money we would get short weights and adulterated goods. This is why governments do the coinage.

2. "Is money a creation of law?" Ans. In the same sense that a gunboat is a creation of law when the law prescribes her dimensions and plan of construction.

3. "Is it money outside of the limits of the government that created it?" Ans. The different nations hav different names for their coins and money units, and these different coins are made of different quantities and qualities of metal. The people of each nation fix the prices of their property in their own money units, and their evidences of debt are made payable in their own coin. Arithmetical calculations are required to determin the value of a debt or a piece of property in a different kind of money. And one kind of money cannot be a legal tender for a debt which was contracted to be paid with another kind of money. The value of any coin in a foreign country is the intrinsic bullion value of the metal plus the cost of coinage, minus the cost of transporting it back to its nativity.

4. "Did any nation ever use the money of another nation as lawful money?" Ans. If any nation ever compelled, by law, its citizens to receive foreign money in payment of debts which were contracted to be paid in domestic money, it usurped the authority which does not belong to government and wronged its citizens or subjects.

5. "If metal money is not money outside of the country that makes it, what is it?" Ans. A commodity, just like bar iron, axes, and hoes.

6. "Does the rule apply to all countries?" Ans. Yes.

7. "Is there any such thing as a money of the world?" Ans. No, and never has been, but perhaps there will be.

8 "Is gold, silver, copper, or any other matter, money before it is coined?" Ans. It is not called money before coinage, but no one will refuse to take it at its real value for a debt, or to exchange money for it.

9. "If all countries were to abolish the law making metal money and substitute some other matter, without changing the quantity, what effect would it hav on the business of the country?" Ans. Then gold and silver would be used in the form of bars, blocks, or plates as a medium of exchange, and would be valued by the ounce, grain, or gram. Debts would be made payable with a certain quantity of gold, silver, wheat, or some other commodity. And if the government should provide that chips of leather, weighing 412½ grains, should be called dollars and should be legal tender for a debt, these would just pass for their value in making heel taps, buttons, washers, etc.

10. "What is meant by intrinsic value?" Ans. The intrinsic value of a metal coin is what the metal is worth as material for watches, etc., plus the cost of coinage when it is wanted for money. The intrinsic value of a leather dollar is what the leather is worth as material for heel taps, buttons, etc., plus the cost of stamping when wanted as money.

11. "Hav gold and silver a greater intrinsic value than other metals?" Ans. Who would swap a gold-cased watch for a brass-cased? Who would swap a silver spoon for an iron one?

12. "What reasons are there for using gold and silver for money?" Ans. They are coinable; they do not rust and are durable. They hav a high intrinsic value, so that in them we hav much value connected with little bulk and weight.

13. "If metal money is necessary, why not some other metal just as well?" Ans. Iron is worth about three cents a pound. Who would want to carry a pound of iron to the bakery to pay for a loaf of bread? What baker would want to keep a warehouse to store his iron in?

14. "What is the value of a gold or silver dollar?" Ans. It is worth one hundred cents of the same money. It has no fixed value in regard to anything except other denominations of the same money. In regard to everything else it has only a relativ value which is always changing.

15. "In buying a horse or other property, using gold or silver coin, what does the selling party get for his property?" Ans. Just as many dollars as he can induce the other party to giv him.

16. "Is the value of gold, silver, or copper coin established by law?" Ans. No more than the value of a bushel of wheat or an acre of land is established by law, except when the law makes a dollar a legal tender for a debt which was contracted to be paid with a dollar of greater value. In that case the law increases the debt-paying capacity of the dollar without increasing its purchase capacity. This is robbing the creditor by law and giving to the debtor.

17. Already answered.

18. "Has not the value of gold changed more than any other metal?" Ans. I think not. The value of gold took a tumble when Pizarro conquered Peru, and when the placer diggings were discovered in California.

For a while gold was the only cheap thing in California. It took $1 to pay for a pound of flour, and $5 to pay for a meal's victuals. As I hav said before, the value of gold is only a relativ value, regulated by the law of supply and demand. An increase or decrease in the supply and demand of either the gold or any other commodity will change their relativ values.

19. "If the silver dollar, 412½ grains, had taken its former place as money, why is it called the seventy-nine-cent dollar?" Ans. Because 412½ grains of coined silver is now only equal in value to seventy-nine cents of coined gold.

20. "Why were all the smaller silver coins made seven per cent light?" Ans. Because the cost of coinage was relativly higher, to make the bullion value of the metal in ten dimes, plus the cost of coinage equal the value of the metal in a dollar plus the cost of coinage.

21. "Why were they deprived of their legal tender quality for all sums over $5?" Ans. To keep a debtor from catching his creditor away from home without a cart or dray or meal-sack, and offering him a legal tender which he could not carry home at one load.

22. "What is the relativ effect in trade upon the rich and the poor by the use of these light-weight coins, which are not a full legal tender?" Ans. The rich man gets more of them than he can climb Jacob's ladder with; the poor are never overloaded with them.

23. "What effect will the drain of gold from one country to another hav upon the productiv interests of those countries?" Ans. Just the same effect that a current of air from one country to another has upon the respiratory interests of those countries. It is either flowing into a monetary vacuum, or it is making one behind it which gravitation will bring it back to.

24. "Where do governments derive their power to coin money, and set thereon a value?" Ans. They derive their power to coin money from the people, but if government ever has the power to set a value on money it will hav to get that power from the devil.

The Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall hav power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. Now, Congress can only regulate the value of money by regulating the supply and demand, and by prescribing the quantity and quality of metals to be put into coins.

Equal Rights.

I doubt whether there is to be found a man in a thousand just like mine; in three months Mr. A. has given into my hands just seventy-five cents, and he is considered a well-to-do man, but bears the name of close. MRS. A.

Men are what we mothers hav made them. So long as we bring up our boys to think father is the head, father must be deferred to before mother; and while mother herself cringes before father's will, just so long will these boys domineer over mother, sister, and wife. So long as mothers call themselvs, and all they hav, father's property, just so long will the sons do the same and feel the same when they marry.

Power creates tyrants.

Most men feel generous and kind if they dole out money when the wife asks for it. They never realize how hard it is to ask. They forget the purse is mutual property, or that there should be two equal purses.

The husband says, "Buy what you want and I will foot the bills."

How would he like it to hav his wine, cigar, and tobacco bills footed by her? Or his other little private spendings submitted to her criticism?

"One man in a thousand!" If I should judge from what I hav known, seen, and experienced, I should say ninety-nine out of a hundred were just patterned after Mrs. A.'s husband as regards money dealings.

Now and then the wife holds the purse, but he usually knows where each dollar goes, and thinks himself generous in letting her deal it out, even although he is fully conscious she can buy far more economically for the house than he can.

He will sell her favorit riding-horse or milk cow and she may whistle for her rights, but she cannot even sell a pig without consulting him. He can mortgage and sell all but the bare land and she has no right to stay the sale, and he can sell the home also, and, by ten thousand ways a man knows only too well how to enforce, can compel her to sign away even the few rights she has.

How long shall these things be?
Only so long as mothers allow them to be.
Wake up one and all and win your rights.
Equality only waits on our demands.
We are the teachers.
We mold the men—let us build then for equality
And it is ours.

AUNT ELMINA.

THE formation of a moral philosophy is usually the first step of the decadence of religions. Theology, then ceasing to be the groundwork of morals, sinks into a secondary position and the main source of its power is destroyed. In the religions of Greece and Rome this separation between the two parts of religious systems was carried so far, that the inculcation of morality at last devolved avowedly and exclusivly upon the philosophers, while the priests were wholly occupied with soothsaying and expiations. In the next place, any historical faith, as it is interpreted by fallible men, will contain some legends or doctrins that are contrary to our sense of right. For our highest conception of the deity is moral excellence, and consequently men always embody their standard of perfection in their religious doctrins; and as that standard is at first extremely imperfect and confused, the early doctrins will exhibit a corresponding imperfection. These doctrins being stereotyped in received formularies for a time seriously obstruct the moral development of society, but at last the opposition to them becomes so strong that they must giv way: they are then either violently subverted or permitted to become gradually obsolete.—Lecky.

THE only fair tribunal to which can be referred the claim of Christianity to be the one divinely revealed religion, is the great and increasing body of men, who, in all civilized lands, are devoting their lives to the study of the facts of nature and society and the critical research of the records of each in past ages. Christianity, as God's sole truth, must stand or fall by its accord with the facts which are scientifically established.—Adams.

Theosophy in a Farewell Address to Secularists.

According to cable reports Mrs. Annie Besant has delivered a "farewell address to the Secularists" of England, but so far only one of her important statements has been sent over the wire. We shall get the remainder of her address probably in the Freethought papers, as whatever Mrs. Besant might say in a speech of this character is of great importance to Freethinkers everywhere.

The one item sent by wire touches Theosophy in its most wonderful phase, and has attracted unwonted attention because of Mrs. Besant's reputation for "hardheadedness," as the reporter puts it. The statement is that since the death of Madam Blavatsky she, Mrs. Besant, has received several spiritual communications from that person, written in her own handwriting without the aid of any human being. Another person now in the flesh has also, she declared, been similarly favored. Mrs. Besant declined to say how the messages reached her or to describe their make-up or contents. She explained this reticence by the statement that she was sworn to secresy and would never betray the confidence reposed in her. Moreover, if the means of communication was revealed it might be used for bad purposes. She was unable as yet to commune fully with the masters, as Madam Blavatsky could, but her knowledge was increasing. Mrs. Besant, the dispatch adds, seems to be in the highest health and the most normal of spirits. "There is nothing in her appearance or manner to indicate an overwrought imagination or a diseased condition of body or mind."

When we reflect upon what such a statement means it is not surprising that it attracts unwonted attention. As one interpreter of Theosophical phenomena states it, it means that there now exist in the remotest recesses of Thibet certain strange human beings, Mahatmas, who, by long continuance in meditation and certain pious practices, hav overcome the ordinary ailments and limitations of mer, hav conquered death and time, and hav acquired a unique and marvelous mastery of secret forces of the universe whereby life has become a perpetual miracle. It means that these beings, like ourselves and yet not of us, hav succeeded in communicating with Mrs. Annie Besant, in writing letters and sending them to her by celestial post, quicker than lightning, so that in a moment they travel from Thibet to London and fall softly as snowflakes from the ceiling.

In the third volume of his "Truth Seeker Around the World," D. M. Bennett tells us that Madam Blavatsky was "entirely in rapport and recognition with these 'astral brothers'" or Mahatmas, and that t was to be nearer the fountain-head of this occult fraternity that Madam Blavatsky and Colonel Olcott removed from New York to India. She passed seven years among the mountains of Thibet, and was, Mr. Bennett says, taken in charge, to some extent at least, by these obscure Brothers, and was regarded by them with special favor. She could place herself in communication with them at will and could call upon them for advice in case of necessity. In A. P. Sinnett's "Occult World" are related many marvelous instances of such communication, and Mr. Bennett relates one thing akin to a marvel on his own responsibility. If it is all that he thought we see no reason why the Brothers should not write letters as well as perform the feats he credits them with. After quoting extensivly from the "Occult World," Mr. Bennett wrote: "I would hav been glad to witness some of these 'scientific phenomena,' but that has not been my privilege. The nearest to a marvel I hav had brought to my vision is the writing in or upon letters received by mail by Colonel Olcott. He had told me how a large share of the letters he receives by mail (and he receives many) appear to pass under the inspection of one of these invisible Brothers, I think this same Koot Hoomi; that certain parts of the letters are underscored in ink of a different color, usually red, and that comments are made upon the matter of the writer, with such hints and suggestions as the mysterious Brother feels like making when he attaches his monogram or signature. These seem to be attended to when in transit, after they reach the post-office, or after they hav been conveyed to Colonel Olcott's office, and it is all done without the letters being opened in the usual way. This of course strikes you and me as being very mysterious and improbable, but you see you and I are ignorant of the occult powers which I hav been alluding to; there is much in nature which we do not yet understand so we must not be too positiv that these things can not take place till we know more of the vast possibilities which do exist in this grand old universe.

"On one occasion I was sitting with Colonel Olcott in his office, when he had just received some letters from the post-office and had not yet opened them. He said to me, 'Here are some letters just received; look at them and see if you think they hav been opened; there may be some of those mysterious marks upon them of which I hav told you, but after you hav examined them I will open them and we will see.' I looked at the letters and they seemed perfectly intact, and presented not the slightest appearance of having been opened. He then opened them with his penknife in the usual way and removed the contents, which he at once showed me, and on each of the four were the mysterious words in red ink or with red chalk, and the characters which the Brother is said to always use. One of the letters was from Madras, one from Ceylon, one from northern India, and the other from some part I do not remember, but all from different places and directions. All were written in black ink, and on each were underscorings in red ink and comments more or less lengthy, with the ever-attendant mystic signature. It is not possible that these red marks could hav been made by the same man and in the same hand at the different points from whence they came. The chances for collusion seemed extremely remote, and the only reasonable solution is that the marks in red were placed upon the letters by one hand and after they left the persons by whom they were written. It may be claimed that Colonel Olcott had manipulated these letters and put the red marks upon them before I inspected them, but I think I know the gentleman too well to believe him capable of such subterfuge. I believe him a strictly honest man. He possibly may be deceived himself, but he is not a deceiver. His statements are also strongly corroborated by the statements of others, none of whom, I think, hav any desire to mislead me. The theory is that this Brother Koot Hoomi, who resides two thousand miles away, up among the Himalaya mountains, has the knowledge and ability to use a real force in nature to enable him at that distance to inspect Colonel Olcott's mail, and to make such comments as he wishes to meet Colonel Olcott's eye, and this without opening or disturbing the letters in the least."

There is, however, something further to be considered in connection with these wonders. Mr. Hodgson, of the Psychical Society, when he visited India on the trail of Madam Blavatsky found startling evidences of fraud in the practices of that astute priestess. The sacred shrine in which letters to the Mahatmas were deposited had more than one opening accessible to human hands; above the seat by which the Mahatmas' letters fell for their devout questioners a tiny trolley was perceptible in the ceiling, and there was a most convenient beam on which the letters might rest till detached by a thread of waxed silk. Moreover, letters written in strange languages unknown by the brethren present were not deciphered by the Mahatmas. Moreover, Madam Coulomb, Madam Blavatsky's trusted assistant, gave the whole thaumaturgical process away by revealing these concealed cabinets in the house of the high priestess of Theosophy, and further declared that the whole business was a fraud. It is conceivable, therefore, that these artifices hav been repeated in London, with the idea of deceiving Mrs. Besant into the belief that she has received the mantle of Madam Blavatsky and is destined to take that individual's place in the Theosophical world. Of course Mrs. Besant is not for a moment to be considered a party to such transaction, but as Hume argued against the biblical miracles, we hav never known dead men to come to life, but we hav known men to lie. It is easier, therefore, to believe that men lie in writing such accounts than to believe the accounts they write.

So it is with the statement in Mrs. Besant's farewell address to the Secularists.

International Congresses.

There will be no International Congress of Freethinkers this year in Europe, as the General Council of the Federation announces that the Spanish Freethinkers, in whose country the meeting was to be held, hav been unable to complete arrangements for it. To make amends for the disappointment caused, they ask that the congress be held in their land next year, in September, and they promis to make the occasion memorable, and work in also a celebration of the discovery of America. This will probably be done, as the French Federation has already agreed.

We suggest to our brethren of the Old World that they reserve their special efforts for a grand international congress to be held in Chicago, Illinois, U. S. A., in 1893, when the four-hundredth anniversary of the discovery of this country will be celebrated with all the vim of the typical American and the characteristic éclat of the great West. On that occasion the Freethinkers of America ought to hold a large and long congress, to which our English, French, Italian, Spanish, German, Dutch, and Austrian brethren should be specially invited, and asked to tell all about Freethought in their countries —what the people are thinking, what they are doing, what laws and customs they hav bearing for and against mental freedom, and what the prospects are for the Christians ever getting to heaven.

We should like to see Mr. Navez, president of the Federation, and Mr. Furnemont, vice president, and Mr. Foote, and Saladin, and Mr. Moss, and the Standrings, and Victor Lennstrandt, and Capt. Otto Thompson, and Henry Berghell, and Dr. Voelkel, and Mr. Schwella, and the Italian Freethinkers who put up the Bruno statue, and Dr. Wille, and Jean Paul Cée, and J. B. Schaere, and the other anticlericals of Paris who hav made the priests take a back seat. During the celebration at Chicago would be an appropriate time for such a gathering, and it would hav great influence in our work. Our foreign speakers would all find audiences of their own nationality to address, for Chicago is a cosmopolitan village and many foreign-born Americans are gathered therein. And when they get over here and see what a great and glorious country this is, notwithstanding that New Jersey, Delaware, Tennessee, and Frances Willard are parts of it, perhaps our Old World co-workers will conclude to settle here and help civilize it.

The World's Fair and the Secular Union.

We learn from the daily papers that the Board of Control of the Columbian Exposition has granted an audience to a delegation of the American Sabbath Union, which presented alleged reasons why the Exposition should be closed on Sundays. Col. Elliot F. Shepard, the Rev. Dr. Francis L. Patton, and members of the association to the number of about fifty were present. Mr. Shepard presented a memorial, signed by himself and Rev. J. H.

Knowles, president and secretary of the Sabbath Union, and Gen. O. O. Howard, Rev. Mr. Patton, and others, made speeches. Mr. Shepard also says in his paper: "Not content with memorializing the National commission, the American Sabbath Union will bring great pressure to bear on the Chicago Directory of the Exposition. This part of the campaign is in the hands of a committee of thirteen. It was decided that a powerful influence would be lost if it failed to ask women to help them. Accordingly a committee of seven was appointed to wait upon the board of lady managers to induce it to use its influence against the opening of the Exposition on Sunday." The delegation was received with distinguished consideration, a special hour being designated for its entrance, and the gallery was given up to it, while the speakers were placed in the body of the house. The tenor of the speeches was sectarianly Christian all the way through.

It occurs to us that this would be a peculiarly appropriate time for the American Secular Union to rouse from its lethargy and go out to Chicago and fight the American Sabbath Union. Dr. Westbrook should oppose himself to the flamboyant Colonel Shepard, while Miss Craddock can be relied upon to make mince-meat of the Rev. J. H. Knowles.

The American Sabbath Union and the National Reform Association (God-in-the-Constitution crowd) are two organizations which the American Secular Union should confront constantly, besides doing its own aggressiv work. We hav in hand a petition, bearing a good many thousand names, protesting against closing the World's Fair on Sundays, and this petition is at the Union's service if the Secular Union will face the Board of Control and the Chicago Directory and tell them just why the World's Fair ought to be open to the people every Sunday of its continuance.

The American Secular Union was formed to do just such things, the people contribute money to hav them done, the Freethought papers support it because they hope to see them done—and if the officers of the Union will not do them officers should be elected who will.

The Sunday Bill Defeated in Canada.

We learn from a writer in a Seventh Day Adventist paper that Mr. Charlton's Sunday bill which has been before the Dominion parliament the past two years, is at last disposed of. The committee to whom it was referred cut it down to less than one-half its original size, retaining only those sections which prohibited the publication of Sunday newspapers, the running of certain railway trains, and the opening of canals for traffic on Sunday. In this mutilated form it was brought before the House of Commons. On motion of Mr. Charlton, the promoter of the bill, the House went into a committee of the whole to consider his measure. A sharp debate followed in which many of the members took part. The strong opposition to the bill from various quarters showed that the present parliament has a majority which does not fall in with the movement now on foot to enforce Sunday observance. In the debate, some of the members spoke in behalf of the Sunday newspaper men; others opposed the bill on the ground that such legislation should be left to the discretion of the provincial legislatures, while other opposition was based on the broad ground of religious liberty, that the people should not be hedged about with "cast-iron laws" nor could they be "legislated into Christianity."

Sir John Thompson, a prominent member, spoke decidedly against the bill; but out of deference to the feelings of the Christian community, he recommended Mr. Charlton to withdraw the measure. He moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. This is called "the tenderest form of perfumed asphyxiation known to parliament."

This brought Mr. Charlton to his feet. He protested against the committee rising without further considering the bill, and insisted that they had the right to deal with the question of Sunday observance, and ought to exercise it. The Montreal Star thus describes Mr. Charlton's last effort in behalf of his bill:

"Mr. Charlton made so vigorous a fight against this effort to chloroform his bill, that the House could hardly recognize in him the mild gentleman who usually sits next to Sir Richard. His voice rang out defiantly through the chamber as he asked if there was nothing left in the bill worth so much as consideration, and twitted Mr. Mills with being far too great a stickler for provincial rights in the face of so important a question. The bill did not meet his views by any means, but he wanted to get some legislation through on this subject. Amid cries of 'No' and 'Carried,' he held that some law of this kind was demanded by the Christian population of Canada, and threatened members with arraignment before public opinion if they flung aside the bill without consideration."

The chairman pronounced the motion to rise carried, but Mr. Charlton demanded a vote. A rising vote was then taken, and the motion was carried with sixty-three yeas and eighteen nays.

The Ignorance of Common Catholics.

It is a dogma of the Roman Catholic church that Mary, the mother of Christ, was always a virgin. But in Matthew i, 25, Jesus is called her "first-born" son, implying that she had other children later. That this is so is proved by Matthew xii, 46, 47—"While he yet talked to the people, behold his mother and his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him. Then one said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without desiring to speak with thee." The cruel reply Jesus made is well known. Again, in Matthew xiii, 55, 56, we read: "Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren [brothers] James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us?" Luke also calls Jesus Mary's "first-born son" (ii, 7), and relates that his "mother and his brethren could not come at him for the press" of people around him. Mark makes the people call him "the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses, and of Juda, and Simon," and they ask, "Are not his sisters here with us?" (Mark vi, 6). John also says that when he went down to Capernaum he was accompanied by "his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples;" and later "his brethren" advised him to go to Judea (John vii, 3). And Paul wanted to know if he could not lead about a sister, a wife, as Christ led about his brethren (1 Cor. ix, 5) and other apostles, whom, however, he never saw save Peter and "James the Lord's brother" (Gal. i, 19).

But, the other day, we heard of a Catholic who had been educated for the priesthood betting a basket of champagne against five dollars that Mary, the mother of Jesus, had no other children. The odds he gave shows how sure he was, and the positivness of his attitude prompts one to inquire if a study of the Bible is or is not one of the requirements of a Catholic college where men are "educated" for the priestly office.

The Effect of Education.

The Free Education act went into effect in England on the 2d instant. On the 1st instant "the clergy of a number of churches felt moved to ask the prayers of the people that the increased freedom in educational matters might not hav an injurious effect upon the cause of religion."

If anyone can read that item, telegraphed from London, and not see its significance and force, his eyes must be blind indeed.

The clergy were the chief opposers of the act which provides for the education of children whose parents are too poor to pay rates or to support them while attending school, and now these obstructors are afraid the act will injure the cause of religion! Let this be remembered: that it is the opinion of the clergymen of England that education hurts religion.

Keep the children ignorant and you can keep the people pious. Educate them and they refuse to believe the old wives' tales of Christianity.

How Does He Know?

The Rev. James M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, says that "Atheists and Freethinkers seldom giv utterance to their views in the presence of their children."

We should like to know where the Rev. James M Buckley, D.D., obtained his information. How many Atheists and Freethinkers is he acquainted with? Does he know even one that regularly reads one of the many thousands of copies of Freethought journals scattered each week over the country who "seldom givs utterance to his views in the presence of his children?"

It is our opinion that the Rev. James M. Buckley wrote as a statement of fact that which he has no means of knowing to be true.

Editorial Notes.

If a few of our readers hav a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1890, in good condition, which they do not want to keep, and will send it to this office, we will return them any other 25-cent book they may select among our publications.

THE Cassadaga camp-meeting passed the following: "Resolved, by the Spiritualists at Cassadaga in convention assembled, That we are unalterably opposed to the closing of the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893 on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

REV. W. F. CRAFTS, the apostle of the "civil Sabbath" with the religion in it, recently visited Bradford, Pa. He severely censured the city council for their action of some months ago on the Sunday ordinance, and declared the Sunday law of Pennsylvania one of the best in the United States. Under his direction a "Rest-day League" was formed and committees were appointed to carry forward the work of forcing the people of Bradford to keep Sunday. But the Sabbatarians will not hav it all their own way. There is a solid opposition, and Henry Frank, the heretical preacher of Jamestown, N. Y., has been engaged by some Bradford business men to lecture against the Sabbatarian scheme.

THE editor of the Catholic News says that the arguments against the "holy" coat of Treves would be equally valid against the gospels. He says: "Where is the evidence having the least validity that they are the writings of the apostles, St Matthew and St. John, and the disciples, St. Mark and St. Luke? Is it not improbable to the last degree that we hav the real writings of these men? We hav not the originals; we hav no copy made from the original manuscripts and properly authenticated. The strongest evidence of their authenticity is the fact that the Catholic church has so presented them to the world for eighteen centuries." Exactly so. The gospels and the holy coat are alike spurious. None is what it pretends to be, and the fact that the Catholic church has presented them to the world for many centuries adds nothing to their value.

THE American Sentinel says: "THE TRUTH SEEKER makes the following excellent point against Judge Hammond's decision in the King case: 'The judge says that it is not necessary to maintain that to violate the Sunday observance custom shall be of itself immoral to make it criminal in the eyes of the law. "It may be harmless in itself because, as the petitioner believes, God has not set apart that day for rest and holiness, to work on Sunday, and yet, if man has set it apart in due form by his law for rest, it must be obeyed as man's law if not as God's law." By this, it is seen, any legislature can establish religious holydays, enforce their observance, and the United States courts afford no redress. We do not believe this is good law; it certainly is monstrously unjust.' THE TRUTH SEEKER is right; the same power that can forbid work upon one day of the week can forbid it on another day; and if, as Judge Hammond asserts, there is no constitutional limitation upon their power, the minority is left absolutely at the mercy of the majority."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Clarksville, Texas, Enterprise throws some solid chunks of truth at the preachers in a recent issue of that journal. Evidently he has Sam Jones and other blatherskites in mind. "Speeches, sermons, and public lectures are public property," he says. "Anyone has a right to criticise them. If the preacher is permitted to say hard and harsh things for the good of others, then the writer must be allowed to say some plain things for the good of preachers. I do not believe the laws of our land giv a preacher the right to attack the private lives of her people. It is low sentiment only that causes a part of the community to look down on a gentleman for resenting an attack on his character by a preacher. My experience has been that born ladies and gentlemen hav no patience with this preacher protection idea or subterfuge. When a man goes before the public as a public man he should stand in a man's shoes. When he comes into a community or a town a perfect stranger and learns from certain flop-eared hounds of slander things detrimental to the characters of certain individuals, it would be far more Christian to go to the persons and tell them of their faults. Even then this would be a delicate matter for a perfect stranger to perform, who, perhaps, has been in the town only sixty or seventy hours. And I think it would be hard to find a gentleman who would do so. Preaching is a pretty good scheme for old bankrupt sots to fall back on. To illustrate, be a big drunkard, get broke, break your poor old mother's heart, kill your wife with neglect, then leave, tell the people all about it, call it a sermon, and for such a worthy case you make a fortune. I think some preachers I hav seen are smart enough to see that the people want some amusement on Sunday and when these preachers left the saloon and the gambling-hells they brought their slang with them to supply the place of the Sunday evening opera. Instead of being rebuked for such profanity as I heard some time ago at a big religious meeting, they actually took up a collection for it. Twenty-five years ago if you had been told that the time would come when you would pay for profanity and preachers would say amen to it you would not hav believed it. But hav you not heard it recently? I saw an old gentleman some time ago pay one dollar for a preacher's calling him an old bald-headed, lying scoundrel, and the little preacher said amen."

EAGLEVILLE, CAL., Aug. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am working for our cause all the time, and am not alone. I will try and send you some new recruits this fall. Money is scarce. Our preacher had the country canvassed to get money to get married on. I distribute all of my books and papers, and expect to get some help in the work in the near future. The letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER are worth the money to me. I would like to hear a little more of the money question discussion. Best wishes to Heston and you all.

There Were Bibles and Religions Before Ours.

FARMERVILLE, Aug. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please let me know through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER (1) what Peter Cooper's religion was. (2) Can you furnish me with some books older than the Bible?

R. F. RABUN.

[1. Unitarian. 2 No book of the Bible is known to hav existed before the time of Ezra, about 500-400 B.C. There are Chinese historical and poetical works dating from 2500 B C., but the translations are voluminous and costly. The Indian Vedas, 1500-1000 B.C , are likewise bulky and expensiv works. However, parts may be obtained at reasonable prices. The Institutes of Menu, 900-600 B C., may be had translated for $8.50. A "Sacred Anthology," containing extracts from about all the religious books of the world, many of them anterior to the Bible, we can furnish for $5. It is collated and edited by Moncure D. Conway, and is an excellent work. Bennett's "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," containing extracts from and copious information on the above and similar books, we sell at $5 for the two vols., cloth; leather, $7 or $8.—ED. Whale Stories as Good as the Ancient One.

PORTLAND, ME., Aug 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: As that whale story sent you by a good brother in Christ did not convince you, I send another which is even more convincing than that. Why will you, in the face of such proof, still doubt (and be damned)?

H. Q. NORTON.

The recent fear of a fire destroying the Lick Observatory must hav recalled to Professor Holden of that institution the story of a terrible tragedy which reached him through the mails and which was the first attempt of his eight-year-old son as a newspaper reporter and editor. The paper was ruled off into columns and an attempt had been made to copy the script heading of the San Francisco Chronicle. The news part of this little attempt at journalism read as follows:

AN AWFUL OCCURRENCE AT SANTA CRUZ.

Yesterday, at about 10 a.m., E. C. Holden, son of Prof. E. S. Holden, was swimming out, a whale came out and swallowed him. It is hoped he will be comed up like Jonah.

P. S.—Later on in the day the whale was seen to spout. Two feet and a little finger of one hand of the unfortunate boy apered in the column thrown up by the mighty animale, but the rest of his body is still missing. The police and fire department hav been called, and the Governor at Sacramento has offered a large sum of $600 reward for the arrest of the criminal.

STILL LATER.—The whale has been arrested, and is now confined in the county jail. It is hoped he will be hung by the mob.

STILL LATER—The whale has offered to giv up what is left of the boy if the governor's reward can be paid to him instead of to the police. A telegram has been sent to the father of the boy to see if he wants what is left of his child.

LATEST—Prof. Holden replied to the telegram that if the swimming teacher could find the boy's clothes on the beach they would do just as well.

The whale is now being hanged in front of the city hall.

Bonfires are lit, and a brass band is playing, and the city is in a blaze of excitement—but the boy!!! Oh! where is he?

A Rejected Communication.

MARION, CONN., Aug. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send herewith a letter I sent to the editor of the New Haven News for publication, but he refused, as "space is too limited" Yes, "space is too limited" in the "newspapers" for such letters as mine, but not for printing the gab of soulless politicians, the bosh talk of hypocritical clergymen, nor for the alluring advertisments of ignorant quacks, fraudulent schemes, and disgusting descriptions of rape, murder, etc. The fact that "space is too limited" in newspapers for what I wish published is the result of another fact, viz., space is too *un*limited in the heads of the majority of mankind—fools. Where would superstition be in fifty years if Infidelity had the "newspapers" subsidized equally as much as Christianity? Perhaps in hades.

I would really like to know who has had the impudence to steal Paine's poetry, and perhaps if this and the other letter are inserted in THE TRUTH SEEKER, some of your many intellectual readers may know and inform us.

Yours truly, EDWIN N. BECHER.

MR. EDITOR: There appeared printed in the New Haven Daily Palladium, date 17th present month, a sense-awakening sermon calculated to arouse those (many) who are slumbering with their morality satisfied with their own goodness to a realization of the magnitude of one particular damnable evil which invites and conducts humanity to repairless ruin. Every decent man, be he Atheist or Christian, will aid the Rev. Clarence Greely in his heroic assault on sham, hypocrisy, and cowardly indifference to error. The writer is on one of those who think that if the clergy would devote more time to the affairs of this world, the eighty or more thousand now in this country might, if they would wholly adopt Mr. Greely's manner of labor, accomplish an everlasting good for mankind of any or no faith But it is a lamentable fact that the clergy in the past, by insisting on the necessity of belief and persistently promulgating an idea that unbelief is of all sins the most enormous, hav hindered the increase of pure morality. Mr. Greely is evidently aware that, however desirable faith may be relativ to another existence, morality now and alone is to be desired more than faith without it. In this he has the concurrence of every rational man. Mr. Greely, judging by his sermon, seems to be a person who welcomes truth whatever its source, and believes that he who knowingly suppresses a fact is a liar; therefore we are sorry to find a serious mistake near the end of his sermon. A quotation was made embracing the third stanza of Thomas Paine's "Song on the Death of General Wolfe," and given as sayings of our Puritan fathers. The original verse was slightly mutilated and mended, and the name "Warren" was substituted for that of Wolfe. Even if Paine was an Infidel, that fact does not justify the original plagiarism, nor purify the character of the author of the misrepresentation, "and whatever may be his rank or title in life, he has the heart of a coward and the spirit of a sycophant," and deserves public exposure and castigation by the populace. Whoever is guilty, let us know. The poem in question has been called one of the most beautiful productions of its kind in the English language, and is here subjoined:

EDWIN N. BEECHER.

In a moldering cave, where the wretched retreat,
Britannia sat wasted with care;
She mourned for her Wolfe, and exclaimed against fate,
And gave herself up to despair.
The walls of her cell she had sculptured around
With the feats of her favorit son,
And even the dust, as it lay on the ground,
Was engraved with some deeds he had done.

The sire of the gods, from his crystallin throne,
Beheld the disconsolate dame,
And, moved with her tears, he sent Mercury down,
And these were the tidings that came:
"Britannia, forbear, not a sigh or a tear
For thy Wolfe, so deservedly loved;
Your tears shall be changed into triumphs of joy,
For thy Wolfe is not dead, but removed.

"The sons of the east, the proud giants of old,
Hav crept from the darksome abodes,
And this is the news, as in heaven it was told,
They were marching to war with the gods.
A council was held in the chambers of Jove,
And this was their final decree,
That Wolfe should be called to the armies above,
And the charge was intrusted to me.

"To the plains of Quebec with the orders I fled,
He begged for a moment's delay;
He cried, 'O forbear, let me victory hear,
And then thy commands I'll obey.'
With a darksome thick film I encompassed his eyes,
And bore him away in an urn!
Lest the fondness he bore to his own nativ shore
Should induce him again to return."

Holy Coats and Holy Coats.

GERMANIA, PA , Aug. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Although we are somewhat out of the world your paper is read by an interested and appreciativ circle of Freethinkers. The article affixed below suggested the rhyme.

MAX M. WINCKLER.

Apart from the suspicious blank in the record of its preservation, the Holy Coat of Treves has one equally likely competitor in the Holy Coat of Argenteuil, which claims to hav an unbroken history since it was purchased of the soldier who drew the prize immediately after the crucifixion. The history of this coat is written by St. Gregory of Tours, who states that it was taken to Galatia, where it was preserved in a wooden box. During the Persian war of 590, the coat was removed for safety to Jaffa, and four years later to Jerusalem. After being transferred back to Persia, the relic found its way to Constantinople, whence the Empress Irène sent it as a gift to Charlemagne, who presented it to his daughter, Theodrada, abbess of Argenteuil, A.D. 800. It was there cut into several pieces by a priest and some of the pieces hav disappeared, but the greater number remain. The fragments which still remain are of goats' hair without any visible seam.

Besides these two famous coats there are others, all claimed to be the veritable coat worn by the savior immediately before being crucified. The best known of these are the holy robe of Moscow, that of Rome, and those deposited at St. Roch, Maggiore, and Venice.

THE POWER OF THE HOLY COATS.

The Socialist of Nazareth
I always pictured needy,
Despised, poor, and seedy;
Barefooted, ditto head,
Ill clad, not overfed,
Eating ears of corn in season,
Cursing barren fig-trees without reason;
I thought his halo bright
Served both for heat and light.
How is it at his death he left
So many coats that we behold?
Did foolish tailors trust of old?
The pilgrims see a coat at Treves,
One at Moscow, one at Venice,
St. Roch and Maggiore possess
Each one of undoubted sanctimoniousness.
His holiness, the pope at Rome,
Has one to purify his home.
To the throne more luster is added by Another infallible ragged lie.
For many years, Stupidity, deceived,
In awe the holy relics kissed,
While cunning, avaricious priests
The pilgrim geese hav fleeced.
Of startling miracles manifold
The gaping, weak-minded fools are told.
My faith is small, but I know they hold
One power still, that of attracting gold.

MAX M. WINCKLER.

A Quibbling Judge Rebuked.

MARQUETTE, KAN , Aug. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It is sincerely to be hoped that the remarks of Judge Hammond supplementing his decision in the case of King will be analyzed and held up to the public view in such a manner as forcibly to present not only the bias of the judge, but also the inconsistency and even falsity of those remarks. As a part of the system by which we would educate the popular mind to a just Liberality no better arguments can be used than the line upon line and precept upon precept, oft repeated, that come from the lips of our enemies. He says: "It was a belief of Mr. Madison and other founders of our government that they had practically established absolute religious freedom and exemption from persecution for opinion's sake in matters of religion." By "other founders" he will doubtless admit such men as Jefferson, Franklin, and Paine; but can he claim that these men were actuated by a spirit devoted exclusivly to the interests of religion? And yet can he ignore such a claim when he says, "This very principle of religious freedom is the product of our religion, as all our good customs are?" Here is a positiv assertion that is predicated upon the universal claim of the church, but how, in the name of consistency, does it accord with his following admission, "The observers of Sunday hav secured the aid of the civil law and adhere to that advantage with great tenacity in spite of the clamor for religious freedom and the progress that has been made in the absolute separation of church and state." Who, pray, are these observers of Sunday? Are they the disciples of Madison, Jefferson, Franklin, and Paine, who are working in, through, and by the church, adhering with the greatest tenacity to every pious advantage "in spite of the clamor for religious freedom," and all to the end that the spirit of our religion may, through the inherent love of the church for absolute religious freedom, grow to such an extension of this principle that religious persecution will come to an end by the grace of God under the power of the church? But he warns us in the mean time that the laws which the "observers of Sunday hav secured" will be rigidly enforced, and that those who desire that the principle of religious freedom be extended must "await its growth into that enlarged application," a growth which Judge Hammond would hav us understand is a product of religion under the gracious care and supervision of the church. Shades of Bruno, Servetus, Huguenots, and all the throng of sacrificial victims whose blood is upon the altar of religious freedom, tell us, is this so? C. PUTNAM.

Spiritualism.

CARYSVILLE, O., Aug. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to present a few thoughts touching the subject of Spiritualism, seeing that much has been said on the subject pro and con. It is a fact we are very apt to entertain prejudices in favor of preconceived opinions, and be biased in consequence to an extent that would exclude what would be termed fair evidence. There is no question but there hav appeared various phenomena assumed to rest upon a Spiritualistic basis, and which hav excited quite an interest on the part of some of our most advanced thinkers, who hav been unable to explain them in accordance with what we call "natural philosophy." As for myself, having been brought up in habits of superstition and taught to regard the inexplicable as the supernatural, I hav to admit that the struggle for emancipation from the thralldom of priestcraft has been attended with considerable embarrassment. But I now experience the consolation of believing that I hav passed the ordeal and hav arrived at that elevation in life's journey from which many of the fogs of irrationalism may be overlooked. I do not wish to be considered dogmatical in my remarks or conclusions, but when a conclusion is fairly arrived at where the preponderance of evidence is looking that way, I see nothing in the way of giving it expression until a more favorable exposition can be rendered. Now, I must confess that I hav not had the opportunity of investigating what is known as modern Spiritualism to the extent that the subject demands, but I must avow that I hav never witnessed an assumed spirit manifestation but that at least appeared to me to come within the bounds of deception.

I hav at various times witnessed slate-writings claimed to hav been performed by spirit hands, but in every case there was more or less attendance of "hocus-pocus" manipulation. I hav not been able to find a medium who would allow a skeptic a fair chance at investigation or who could giv more than a vague representation in the presence of an unbeliever. Now, it seems to me that truth should not scorn the light of day or seek to present its facts in the gloom of a darkened chamber, as is the case with many of the leading spirit phenomena. If the spirits of our departed friends seek an interview with us why do they not appear to us in a way that would exclude the possibility of deception and settle for all time the question of their being?

I do not say that spirit life does not exist. What I claim is that it has never been demonstrated. Many of those who hav become Spiritualists hav been brought up under the teachings of orthodoxy and having been compelled from intellectual conviction to renounce the Bible as an unreliable guide, and being possessed of sympathetic natures and a strong proclivity to life, hav abhorred the idea that death ends all and sought protection from oblivion in the mysterious vagaries of Spiritualism. No doubt, as a rule, Spiritualists are honest, but honesty is no criterion of truth when selfish prejudices are apt to warp the judgment. In conclusion allow me to say that although I cannot go with Spiritualists in their philosophy I admire their liberality. Some of our greatest workers in the cause of humanity are Spiritualists, and are doing much to elevate the world of thought above the foolishness of Christian dogmas.

I do not wish to rob anyone of a single ray of hope that would tend to lighten the toils of life, but having carefully examined the matter in so far as opportunity permitted I am driven to the conclusion that our individuality and consciousness ends with the dissolution of our physical organisms.

The Financial Question.

Aug. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: One of your correspondents asks, "What is money?" My idea of money is that it is a medium of exchange to obviate the difficulties of direct barter; also that it is the representativ of value. I look upon the volume of money, large or small, issued by any government, as representing the value of all the property or wealth of that country. Therefore stability of value is the great necessity of any currency. Now, gold, being of all metals the least liable to change in quantity (on account of its scarcity it is the only metal not liable to great fluctuation), is the very best thing available to represent permanent value. Any other article used for money is liable to fluctuation according to the amount issued, which makes the great fluctuations in prices. Here lies the great danger of a paper currency. According to the whims of any party in power it can be increased or diminished and prices made to fluctuate to great extremes, which is to the great advantage of the bankers and speculators, who take advantage of the owners of real property by buying when money is cheap and selling when it is dear. This cry for cheap money that the speculators hav persuaded the Farmers' Alliance to make is the most supreme folly, entirely in the interest of the speculator, who makes his money out of a fluctuating currency. Suppose we concluded to do without gold or silver currency, what could hinder one party when in power issuing unlimited amounts of money, and when the other came into power contracting the currency just as they pleased, and buying real property when money was cheap and selling when it was dear? And they would take care to so manipulate the elections that they would get into power alternately, as they hav in this state for years managed to divide the spoils by keeping one Senator from each party in the Senate of the United States for many years.

The same correspondent wants to know if anyone can tell him the value of a dollar. The value of a single dollar depends on the limit to the amount coined and issued. As the whole represents the whole amount of the property of any country, so the value of each depends on the amount coined and issued. If you coin and issue a large amount of dollars, you will hav to giv more dollars for the same amount of property or the necessaries of life.

Looking on the question in another light, the mere probability of the United States adopting the silver standard has caused all the financial trouble we are passing through at present, and caused the owners of our bonds in other countries to send them over and sell them for gold while they could get it, knowing that if that policy was adopted it would be equal to repudiating three-tenths of the debt.

Some people say it would reduce the home debts to the same proportion and be favorable to the debtor class. They do not think that the railroad monopolies, whose charges are the great incubus on the farmer's back, whose charges take all the profit there is in his product, are the greatest debtor class in the whole country, and they would also hav the benefit of this repudiation—for it could be called nothing else.

JNO. DOWNES.

Persecuted by Christians.

KENT, O., Aug. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been more than usually interested of late in your arguments. Your columns hav given me much satisfaction in reading pro and con on many subjects, and more especially on the money question. I am glad to know that the people are thinking, and, still more, are going to think. Thanks to our free schools that set our posterity to thinking and then to daring to express their thoughts, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven" (freedom).

I wish to add an idea or two for the consideration of some who hav never thought of them.

I wish to equalize as much as possible the opportunities of the citizens of our United States; not to take from one and giv to another, but to giv each a chance, and an equal chance, to make a home for themselvs, and that a happy one. For it seems to me that the Lord who is counting the hairs of our head puts in more time in counting than protecting them, and allows a very uneven distribution among his children of intellect and of conditions that control them, and consequently in the necessaries of life, which are the natural results. To remedy some of these, I would change our laws so that no parent could make an unequal division of property to their children, but all share alike, and that no one should hav to exceed one-half million of dollars in property or money, all in excess of such amount to fall to the county or state in which they reside. Why should a child of one be born with a silver spoon in its mouth, and another to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, simply because the parents of one hav succeeded in getting more than their share of lucre to the detriment of others? We are not born "free and equal" in any sense of the word.

Again, I would confiscate all taxable property that is not given in for taxation. Why should the honor of one be taxed to pay the dishonor of another? There is probably billions of dollars' worth of property in the United States every year not returned for taxation. How many certified lies are required to cover up such amounts I know not. If all property or values was returned for taxation, and all church property required to pay its proportion of taxes, our national debt could be paid in one year.

I am thankful that the time has arrived when "bonfires of human suffering" are past, and we dare speak our sentiments, for by such we learn from each other and the "curdled waters" of government will be made clear without resort to arms.

Yet reformations come slow. I will relate some of the experience of the worthy president of our Kent Secular Society, Joseph Heighton, as he is certainly worthy to be called a great reformer. Mr. Heigaton is one of the fearless and bold advocates of truth and justice, evermore letting his light shine that darkness shall be dispelled. As early as the year 1845 he espoused the cause of antislavery, "took the stump," and lectured in many places to large audiences. He was mobbed at divers times, knocked down, and driven away, only to return with fresh ideas to giv battle to all opposing arguments. He was threatened again and again, and ordered to leave his home or "hold his tongue." He did neither. His bees were stolen, then his sheep and hogs. His oxen (the team of those days) were poisoned. At last, his fine residence, in which was stored his grain for safe-keeping, was burnt, with its contents, leaving himself and family to escape in their night-clothes. "There now, damn you, I guess you will quit lecturing and holding meetings at your house," was the pleasant greeting he received from some good neighbors, and "If this is not enough we will call later!" A time was afterward set to murder him and family, but "the Lord" smote the conscience of one of the number, and Mr. Heighton was warned in time to prevent such a crime. To-day Mr. Heighton is called a "nice man" but an old Infidel. Many of the lecturers who hav visited Kent will remember his voice, accompanied by his violin, at our meetings. His son, Marius, secretary of our Kent Secular Society, has done and is doing more to spread the cause of freedom than any other member of our society. Nevertheless, we hav many faithful ones who are always ready to "stand up for the Lord" as best they can. We hope to organize a Secular Sunday-school at an early date.

May you liv to prosper and carry light to the world, is the wish of a subscriber,

A. D SWAN.

The Soul Insurance Company.

NEW DULUTH, MINN., Aug. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Again I write you. In reading some papers I chanced to hav a New York Weekly Witness. I see attributed to a "Rev. Gentleman" an article which seems to me one of the most nonsensical of any I hav ever read. The purgatorial question is at present tough enough. This, as you can see, takes the cake. It adds a few more pleasures to the middle "heaven" and makes it a place more endurable and enviable. Can thinking persons believe such trash? But inconsistency is one of the failings. It seems so strange that an educated man would try to do such, but the "gospel pill is easy for some to gulp down." He is not only religiously dishonest, but his scheme is tending to degrade instead of elevate the human family.

Please print the article which I herewith inclose. I think Heston could giv us a nice little illustration in connection. I am very sorry to hear of his sickness, and hope soon to see the fruits of his labor again in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Now a question. I should like to know whether or not the law allowing members of Parliament to affirm in England was repealed or not.

Let some of the brothers look this over and let me hear from them. Yours for Freethought, H. H. SALMON.

INSURANCE FOR SOULS.

A Depere (Wis.) letter in the Minneapolis Tribune says: "Father Durin, of St. Joseph's Catholic church in this city, is the author of a new and unique kind of insurance in which he has successfully interested the members of his own and surrounding parishes. Father Durin's plan involves the saving of the soul of the assured after death. The parent organization is known as 'the deliverance society,' with the head office at St. Joseph's rectory, the Rev. J. F. Durin being manager. The prospectus of the society states that it is organized on the same principle as a mutual assurance society. The offering for admission fee is twenty-five cents, and the annual contribution is ten cents. 'There will be no reserve fund,' it states, 'but all contributions will be immediately emptied in the celebration of mass and for the deliverance of the souls in purgatory.' The 'deliverance society' was entirely original with him, and it grew out of his exceedingly strong belief in purgatory as a place where the venial sins of the departed can be expiated and their souls assisted therefrom, through the prayers of good Catholics. He considers the scheme an application of business principles to spiritual matters. Such companies are effectiv in saving the members from disastrous effects of losses by fire or accident; so in a similar way he seeks in this society to unite the efforts of the members of the Catholic church to save the souls of any one of them who might through carelessness or ignorance hav committed some venial sin, which, although not deserving punishment in hell, would prevent their entrance to heaven, and perforce to justly demand their detention in purgatory until his society should be heard from. The society has already a membership of several hundred, Father Durin affirmed, and he says the scheme is approved by brother priests and his superiors in the church, as it is a logical outcome of one of the sincerest beliefs of the Catholic church."

[There is no special law authorizing affirmation in Parliament. Mr. Bradlaugh took the oath. The law he afterward had passed for the benefit of those who object to swearing was general, and applies in Parliamentary and all other circumstances. It reads: "Every person, upon objecting to being sworn, and stating, as the ground of such objection, either that he has no religious belief, or that the taking of an oath is contrary to his religious belief, shall be permitted to make his solemn affirmation instead of taking an oath in all places and for all purposes where an oath is or shall be required by law." The bill also provides a written affirmation in lieu of affidavits. Mr. Bradlaugh said of his law: "The 'Oaths Act, 1888,' is noteworthy as being the first statute of this realm in which persons without religious belief hav ever been recognized as citizens to be legislated for. In all previous enactments such Freethinkers hav been treated as criminals to be punished, or as persons to be insulted. The 'Oaths Act, 1888,' placed persons without religious belief on exactly the same level as to affirmation as persons having religious belief. The act removes many disabilities to which Freethinkers hav been subjected for centuries. It enables such persons in Scotland to be competent as witnesses, which heretofore they were not. It repeals the statutes under which the inquisitorial and sometimes insulting queries and observations occurred to which Freethinking witnesses were liable in England, Wales, and Ireland. It takes away throughout the United Kingdom the disability theretofore attaching to Freethinking jurors. It enables persons without religious belief to affirm their allegiance whenever oath of allegiance might otherwise hav been required, and it renders impossible the repetition of the Parliamentary struggle which lasted from 1880 to 1885"—ED. T. S.]

Will Shoot Him for Bringing The Truth Seeker.

HOUSTON, TEX., Aug. 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I would willingly and gladly make my inclosure $50, for the reason that your paper is a sort of universal educator in Radical philosophy, economics, and sociology, and along with your contributors the conservativ and dilettante society leaders contrast as bats and moles. The Frances Willards and Mrs. Livermores, in the eloquent words of Sam Jones, are as owls to me since making the acquaintance of THE TRUTH SEEKER family. Talmage, et al, are so inferior that verily they hav the brains only of gnats and tadpoles. My education commenced with the reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER, old Dr. Foote's works, and Nordau's book. And before reading any Radical literature I thought I was decidedly smart and entitled to consideration—and, strange to say, was twenty-five years old before I knew anything of the existence of anything but wishywashy conservativ trash. Which goes to show the lethargic condition of the ordinary mind.

I hav been trying to get at least one subscriber, but nary one. One man threatened to shoot anyone who should bring such literature in his house. However, Houston has some shining Infidels.

Sam Jones the commoner was with us last June for ten days and played hobbledehoy. Indeed, he succeeded in separating Houston's population into two hostil factions and worked them up almost to shotgun heat. Indeed, there was danger of wholesale bloodshed at one time, principally over the enforcement of the Sunday laws. The inclosed manuscript is a very free condensation of Jones's harang during his stay here, by a stanch Infidel of our town, one Joseph Devine.

H. W. NELSON.

A SERMON (NOT) BY SAM JONES.

Delivered at Houston, Tex., during a ten days' blow-out, as heard and understood by Joseph Devine (not divine).

Suckers of Houston: I am here. Hear me. I am the great religious fakir from Fakirville, Ga. Now listen. Any sort of religion is good enough for me, but there must be more enthusiasm and—and money in it. "Thy speech is silver," to quote the poet, but gold and greenbacks are not bad in their way. All is fish that comes to my net, and I am the chosen friend of the orphans of Fakirville. I always let my left hand know what my right hand doeth, which is better than the other way and catches the public. Do not your charities in secret, you "old owls," but come to the front. Bring your money along and cry "Amen" to what I say. I am one humble Christian myself and the commander of the Lord's hosts. If you get struck dead for refusing to agree to all I say don't blame me, for I am prepared to bet $500 that what I say is true. Hear me! You are all in a fair way for hell and I could take you there by strewing the path with nickels. It takes more than nickels, however, to catch me, so when the hat is passed around put in your $5 and $10 bills. The incidental expenses of this show must be met. The gospel is free, but it takes money to get the pure brand which I carry around. What I fail to get this trip I shall collect on my next, for I shall be back in the fall and clean up the town. Hear me! I am an humble worker in the Lord's vineyard. You old topers! You are too mean for anything. I always abuse you chaps in every town It is perfectly safe, for everyone looks at his neighbor and no one talks back; if anyone did I would hav him arrested for disturbing religious worship. You need not smile. This is religious worship according to the statute, even if it does appear like a circus. Unlike a circus, I shall take away all the money I collect and pay out. I pay my debts, which is more than you do. I hav the money to do it, which I get with a hook baited for just such fish as you. You think you are going to become a great city and a metropolis with your dozen railroads and ever-increasing working population, but I tell you if you don't take pattern by Fakirville, Ga., where everyone is good, the devil will get you all. If anyone is not good in my town we organize a vigilance committee and giv him a few hours to leave. Oh, we know how to deal with sinners if—if they hav no money. You white-aproned scoundrels! Do not think that the money you donate to good deeds is going to save you. It will giv the devil a stronger grip on you if it don't receive my stamp and sanction. I am greater than the doctrin of Christ. Join the church, I say. No matter what church—one is as good as another as far as I am concerned, for I am a kind of universal contortionist acrobat. I was once drunk for three years, and any old hypocrit, provided he is a church-member, is better than you heathens who expect to get to heaven on your good deeds. The brother who plays second fiddle will now sing a solo to the tune of "Hold the Fort." Those who hav not hymn-books can pull out their pocket-books.

Pass the hat, and pass it briskly, sinners tremble now,
Or black crape will soon be waving from some stricken brow.
I am righteous, I am holy, you are vile, impure,
I've been ransomed, washed—not white—washed holier than thou.
Refrain.

Pass the hat, and pass it gaily, we've come here to win.
Incidental pick-ups daily is the boat we're in.
Don't think your deeds will save you, I've a gospel new,
I outrank all previous teachers, beat them through and through,
I've compiled some new commandments, fifty cents a book,
Quit your meanness, help the orphans—I am one, just look.
Refrain.

I'm an orphan, I'm appealing, pass the hat, I say,
"Still so gently o'er me stealing" comes that smile, go' way!

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

My World.

My world—its wealth I cannot tell—
Lies hid in yonder quiet dell!
In that low house from whence you see
The smoke come curling gracefully.
That cottage is my palace—home!—
And sure, no king upon his throne
E'er tasted joy so sweet to win,
So true and pure, so free from sin,
As in that place has filled my life,
And purified it from all strife;
For in that spot came heaven to me,
With my sweet wife and babies three.

S. H. W.

A Protest.

When persons claim the right divine
To save or damn my soul,
I'd like to lash them with the truth,
E'en from pole to pole.

They're blind as bats in noonday sun,
Or moles beneath the ground,
They talk of hells they never saw,
And heaven not yet found,

Sell "corner lots" in golden streets
To villains, rogues, and knaves,
Who grind the faces of the poor,
And make their betters slaves.

Our priest picks out the soft pine wood,
And saws with lazy stroke,
And leaves a poor infirm old man
To saw the knotty oak.

And when they call on sisters dear,
Placed at the table's head,
They're sure to get the choicest bits,
While workmen go half fed.

They cast their ruined women by,
As godly Beecher did,
To starve or freeze in deep disgrace,
While they are higher fed.

The rich old wine all gather round
To save their souls from doom;
The younger come to brace their nerves
With fans and sweet perfume.

And thus the wheel goes round and round
That these imposers turn,
But 'fore I'll hav such saving grace,
In hell-fire I will burn.

You say that all are not the same,
That some should be received;
But all preach falsehood more than truth,
And cannot be believed.

They know no more about a life
Beyond this one on earth,
Than we knew of this present world
Before we had our birth.

And if they did—our work is here,
And if we gaze up there
We lose our time, we trip or fall,
And fail to do our share.

Our time is now—forever now—
Let's do our duty well;
And then we need not fatten priests,
Nor fear a future hell.

Biographical Sketches.

V.—DRYDEN.

John Dryden was born at Aldwinckle, in Northamptonshire, on August 9, 1631. His father was the son of Sir Erasmus Dryden, created a baronet in 1619. Young Dryden had an excellent education. He successfully passed the examination at Cambridge after a period of four years, and became bachelor of arts in 1653. In 1654 he became master of arts. He then went to London under the patronage of Sir Gilbert Pickering, to whom he was warmly attached, but after the publication of a poem entitled "Astræa Redux" a coolness was observed between the baronet and Dryden, supposed to hav occurred on account of the poem mentioned above. Dryden then became author by profession, and wrote plays for the stage. His first acted play was "The Wild Gallant." In the month of December, 1663, he married the daughter of the earl of Berkshire. One of his plays, which has attained great popularity, was written after the style of Shakspere's "Antony and Cleopatra." It is entitled "All for Love; or, The World Well Lost."

After the death of King Charles II., he was converted to the Roman Catholic religion. His change of faith seemed to meet with the displeasure of his friends, as the historian Macaulay called him "an illustrious renegade." In 1698 he commenced his great poem, "Fables," and finished it in a year and a half. In 1700, during the month of April, Dryden was troubled with "a slight inflammation in one of his toes, which became from neglect a gangrene." The family doctor wanted to amputate it, but the poet would not let him, as he thought what remained to him of health and strength was hardly worth the pain of amputating it. He died on May 1st, in his sixty-ninth year.

Correspondence.

TAMPA, FLA., Aug. 18, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never written to you before, but as you invite all the children to write I thought I might be a Cornerite, too. Mr. Walker lets me read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like it much. Do you not think that story of "The Father's Return" splendid? I love to read the Children's Corner, for I always fiad something to please me in it. But, oh! aren't Mr. Heston's pictures just jolly? When I get big enough to think I will take THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am now only nine years old. But I guess I must stop; this is getting too long.

Your little truth seeker, JESSIE ROUTH.

WENATCHEE, WASH., Aug. 10, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Friend: You hav been kind enough to print two of my letters, so I am going to ask you for another kindness.

Our friend and brother, Edwin Thorpe, gav mamma a book as a present, and in it was a poem he had written and left there by mistake. Now, I think it is too good to be lost, so I am going to send it to you and would be much obliged to you if you could hav it printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER or Corner. In my last letter to the Corner is stated the trouble I had in enduring religious exercises at school. C. B. Reynolds has written to papa about it, and we will not be troubled any more in that way, thanks to his help.

There has been a good deal said about collectors and collections of minerals. I am also a collector. I would like to trade specimens of marble onyx from papa's mine to some one for other specimens of onyx for my collection.

Hoping you will be kind enough to print the poem, I will close.

HELEN MARGARET PARRISH.

PALISADE MINES, CALISTOGA, CAL., Aug. 14, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: You no doubt hav forgotten me, although I hav written to the Corner twice before; one of the letters was to you, a sort of private letter, and I requested you not to publish it. Do you remember?

I hav been very busy this year raising chickens. I hav about ninety now, and I am going to raise a hundred.

Is that not doing pretty well? I hav raised them all myself, too; no one has helped at all, only, of course, when there were any sick I had mamma help me a little then. (Oh, I must not forget the hens; they, of course, did something toward raising the chickens.)

I hav a pony to ride; his name is Gobo. He is in pasture at present. I hav fine times riding him. I ride on the surcingle and like it ever so much better than the side-saddle. Do you like to ride?

Where I now liv is at papa's silver mines. I used to liv in Napa, but like this place ever so much better; it is a very pretty place. The mill and all the houses are built in a canyon, and a very pretty canyon it is, too. There are some very high cliffs at the head of the canyon, and to the right of the cliffs are the Palisades.

Well, I hav written a long enough letter, too long perhaps, for maybe I hav tired you. So I say good-bye. LOLA GRIGSBY.

[Yes, Lola, we remember you very well. You hav improved in writing. It must be quite an interesting family of chickens that you hav to care for, but we are sure you are equal to it. We hope it will not be long before we shall hear from you again. —ED. C. C.]

THE
French Invasion of Ireland in '98.
Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.
By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.
With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.
The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparativ oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

THE Chilian revolutionists hav established themselvs firmly, and the overthrown president Balmaceda has fled.

ARCHBISHOP WALSH has instructed the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland to pray for fine weather, and to instruct their congregations to do likewise.

NEGRO emigration to Liberia is again agitated.

INpiously mismanaged Russia thousands are starving.

TEXAS has reduced her annual record of murders from 741 for 1868 to 200.

ON the 26th ult. at Tualis, Austria, lightning struck a church crowded with women and killed three.

THE English magazine Darkest Russia declares Russia a standing menace to civilization, and summons the world to a crusade against her.

THE rival exhibitors of the holy coat of Treves and that of Argenteuil hav compromised on allowing the latter to be one worn by Christ when child.

LEO XIII. has directed bishops to invite workingmen throughout the world to make pilgrimages or send delegates to thank him personally for his labor encyclical.

AT the Methodist camp meeting at Sidney, N. Y, on the 30th ult., the impassioned exhortations of young Preacher Truesdell merged into discordant and incoherent cries. He had become insane from religious excitement.

KOCH continues to work on his remedy undiscouraged. assisted by the government.

THE pope is preparing an encyclical on different forms of government, to show how nations are indebted to the church for conciliatory settlements of differences.

THE Catholic party in Nicaragua, which supplanted the anti-Catholics in government, has convicted of conspiracy and exiled five leaders of the latter, two of whom are ex-presidents.

THE congregation of Mountain Hill church, near Greenville, S. C., mostly moonshiners, on the 23d ult. interrupted communion service with a general shooting affray in the church. A family feud was the cause. Two were killed.

MASSACHUSETTS authorities say that they intend to enforce the laws by which record is kept of offenders against sobriety, and a person arraigned who has been drunk twice in a year is confined for a long term and treated as a diseased person, with a view to reform.

CARDINAL PAROCCHI says: "Leo has clearly and plainly expressed approval of a political alliance with the democracy. It is the only good and possible alliance. The church will hav to reckon less with dynasties and states than with the people. The reign of the democracy is a fact, and a triumphant fact."

THE two husbands of Mrs. Kramer, Brooklyn, N Y, fear to prosecute her for bigamy, because she is a witch. Both men at different times on the 29th ult. complained to Justice Engle that she is a witch, but, the report says, "as that does not constitute a crime, the court took no cognizance of their complaints."

J. B. BARNUM, the Wisconsin rival of Schweinfurth the Illinois messiah, has been placed in the insane asylum. Nine years ago he proclaimed himself Christ. His wife and many neighbors accepted him as such He rambled through the country, stopping persons and conjuring them to accept him as the savior.

THE duke of Westminster, who has examined Russian affairs, declares the inhumanity of the Russian authorities astounding, almost incredible. The czar, he says, is ranking himself with rulers like the religious bigot Philip II. of Spain, who hav used their irresponsible power not for their subjects' good but for their ruin.

A MAN entered the Convent of the Most Sorrowful Mother, Williamsburg, N. Y., on the night of the 28th ult., and attemp ed violence to the nuns. They struggled long with him, in gas light, but he could not be described sufficiently for identification, because, Father Zentsagraf explained to the detectiv, the nuns were taught not to look at a man's face.

ESTHER GOETH TO THE KING'S HOUSE.

So it came to pass, when the king's commandment and his decree was heard, and when many maidens were gathered together unto Shushan the palace, to the custody of Hegai, that Esther was brought also unto the king's house, to the custody of Hegai, keeper of the women.—Esther ii, 8.

Gems of Thought.

THE history of the Christian church, from the beginning to the present day, presents little else than a history of disgraceful quarrels of the most rancorous description, and a series of falsehoods unexampled in all the other pages of history. Pious frauds consecrated by the highest authority; false gospels, false documents, interpolations of ancient authors for the purpose of deception, false saints, false relics, false miracles, forged acts of councils, false decretals, false donations, false revelations, specters, and apparitions, preternatural communications, miraculous cures, and supernatural revivals and outpourings of the spirit upon ignorant men and hysterical women, supported by the testimony of ancient fathers of the church, pontiffs, bishops, doctors, and holy men of the most popular sanctity, belonging to all manner of conflicting sects, and agreeing in nothing but the common duty of religious lying, forging, and inventing, to serve the interest of the priesthood, and promote the common cause of public deception.—Abner Kneeland.

THE clergy found it necessary to preserve the Sabbath for their own uses, and for that reason endeavored to impress the people with the enormity of its violation, and for that purpose gave instances of people being drowned and suddenly struck dead for working or amusing themselvs on that day. The clergy hav objected to any other places of amusement except their own, being opened on that day. They wished to compel people either to go to church or stay at home.—Ingersoll.

LET one take up the Bible as he does any modern book, and judge of its contents according to the impression made upon his faculties, and it seems impossible not to reject its claim to be the infallibly inspired word of God, and perceive it to be a compilation of Hebrew traditions and poetry made by men in darker ages than the present.—R. O. Adams.

IT is often said that if the fears of hell-fire were suddenly removed, men would abandon themselvs without restraint to their propensities and appetites; recklessness and despair would take possession of the human race, and society would be dissolved. But I believe that the fears of hell-fire hav scarcely any power upon earth at all, and that when they do act upon the human mind it is to make it pious, not to make it good.—Reade.

THE Jewish books are very modern. Ignorance and fanaticism exclaim that the Pentateuch is the most ancient book in the world. It is evident, that those of Sanchoniathon, and those of Thaut, eight hundred years anterior to those of Sanchoniathon; those of the first Zerdusht, the Shasta, the Vedam of the Indians, which we still possess; the Five Kings of China; and, finally, the book of Job, are of a much remoter antiquity than any Jewish book. It is demonstrated, that this little people could only hav annals whilst they had a stable government; that they only had this government under their kings; that its jargon was only formed, in the course of time, of a mixture of Phenician and Arabic. These are incontestable proofs that the Phenicians cultivated letters a long time before them.—Voltaire.

THIS doctrin, that sins can be forgiven, and the consequences of them averted, has in all ages been a fertil source of mischief. Perhaps few of our intellectual errors hav fructified in a vaster harvest of evil, or operated more powerfully to impede the moral progress of our race. . . . It has encouraged millions, feeling what a safety was in store for them in ultimate resort, to persevere in their career of folly or crime, to ignore or despise those natural laws which God has laid down to be the guides and beacons of our conduct, to continue to do "that which was pleasant in their own eyes," convinced that nothing was irrevocable, that however dearly they might hav to pay for re-integration, repentance could at any time redeem their punishment, and undo the past. The doctrin has been noxious in exact ratio to the baldness and nakedness with which it has been propounded. In the Catholic Church of the middle ages we see it perhaps in its worst form, when pardon was sold, bargained for, rated at a fixed price.—Greg.

THE CRY OF MANKIND.

Notes and Clippings.

All the correspondence from the Vatican concerning church matters is carried on in Latin.

Francis Darwin, a son of the great apostle of evolution, is becoming famous for his researches in biology, and was recently elected president of the biological section of the big demographic congress in London.

There is only one solution of the papal problem. The pope must be an independent sovereign with a territory and a seaport all his own If Italy does not choose to giv it—and she seems to dread a parting with the papal court—then some other nation will giv it.—Catholic Review.

"The pope," laments the Catholic Freeman's Journal, "remains at Rome all the year through. Summer heats and winter breezes are borne by the vicar of Christ in the palace where he is virtually a prisoner. This is the outcome and the consequence of the Italian occupation of Rome; and there is no immediate prospect of anything that is likely to bring about a change in this condition of the pontiff."

It is not generally known that there ever has been a law since the adoption of the United States Constitution, in any of the states, which would debar a citizen from filling the office of governor by reason of being a Roman Catholic. The New Hampshire constitution, adopted in 1792, in Sec. 42 provided that the governor must be a Protestant; this section was repealed in 1877 Sec 32 of the North Carolina constitution, adopted 1776, had the same provision, and this section was in force until 1835.

The following passages are from the "Manual of Unsectarian Instruction," in daily use in the elementary schools of Paris, now controled by the government: "Teacher—'What is God?' Child—'We cannot tell.' Teacher—'Do you acknowledge a superior or controling being?' Child—'Why should we? Prove to us the necessity, and show him to us.' Teacher—'It cannot be proved that such a being is indispensable.' Child—'Then it is a waste of time to talk about the matter.'"

Most of the mountain men of Tennessee and neighboring states rigorously abstain from work on the Sabbath, but it is not because of any reverence for the day that their ancestors in Scotland made so long, so pious, and so gloomy, for they consider it, like Sir Toby Belch, just the occasion to get drunk on and the properest time for a fight. They say grace before meat and pride themselvs on their ability to pray, but to the strangers their prayers often sound like profanity, and there are times, when aroused and desperate, when their oaths sound like prayers uttered in the fervor of a camp-meeting excitement.

It is significant that the two communions which include so great a majority of the Protestant believers are those which hav been least affected by the theological revolution now going forward. The faith of b th Baptists and Methodists remains substantially unchanged. It is the same now as it was when they received their first impetus from the early revivals. They believe in the Bible as the absolutely infallible word of God and as the only source of authority in matters of faith and practice. Perhaps they are less disposed than formerly to rely on the terrors of the law as a means of converting sinners, preaching the love of God rather than his wrath, but they dare not question the perfect truth of the Bible.

The negroes hav been conducting a bush-arbor meeting at Union Point, and the preacher in charge told his hearers to come to meeting and bring everybody they could. He said we would hav good weather for a week; that there would be no rain, for he had prayed to that effect and he knew what he could do in that direction. One of our citizens thought we needed rain as bad as we needed the bush-arbor meeting, if not a little worse; so he had a black snake killed and hung up to butt against the negro, hence it was a fight between him and the snake. The snake won, for on Monday evening the rain came—and a good one, too—thus beating the darkey and his bush arbor by three or four days from the time set for it to rain.—Atlanta Constitution.

Suppose a dissenter in Russia persuades, directly or indirectly, some one to abandon the Greek church. The code, Article 184, provides that for the "crime" of perverting anyone, either by means of temptations or otherwise, from the Christian faith to Islamism, Judaism, or other non-Christian faith, the guilty person will be sentenced to loss of all civil and personal rights and penal servitude from eight to ten years. For inducing anyone to leave the orthodox faith for another Christian denomination, the punishment is the loss of all personal rights and privileges and banishment to Siberia. To such penalty Protestant or Catholic is liable if ever he ventures to speak of his religious faith. If it can be proven that he has thus spoken, it will be easy to find some one to declare that some one else has been by this means persuaded to forsake the orthodox faith.

The outside world can scarcely hav any idea of the extent to which religious intolerance is carried in the Russian code of laws. There is scarcely any more heinous crime than openly disagreeing with the Greek church, and it does not matter whether the dissenter be a Catholic, Protestant, Jew, Mohammedan, or Atheist. All are alike hateful. For example, the criminal code, article 196, expressly provides that anyone found guilty of propagating the views of heretical or dissenting bodies, or of circulating the doctrins of any new sect dangerous to orthodoxy, will be punished with the forfeiture of all rights, and banished from European Russia to Transcaucasia, from the Stavropol government or from Transcaucasia to Siberia, and from Siberia to the most remote regions of that country. The same punishments will be meted out to dissenters who, under the influence of their fanaticism, use insulting terms about the orthodox church or orthodox clergy. A dissenter who publicly makes known his false doctrins to the orthodox, with a view to their joining his sect, even though his action should not result in any accession from the orthodox church, will be punished most severely.

Christus.

PROEM.

Christendom is gone into mourning for its crucified God. The bells are silent. The churches are wrapped in black, and the guard of honor is holding watch round a black coffin, which contains nothing—a true emblem of Christianity, which contains also nothing.

Indeed, after a careful investigation upon the structure of Christianity, we must find how rotten the building is, and that its foundation is laid upon a weak spot. The first who dared to break the stony image of Christendom with his hammer of criticism was Strauss, whose "Life of Jesus" was an attempt to give us a historical, not a divine, Jesus, but unfortunately his work was spoiled by Renan, a French writer, who, unable to read the Talmud (the only book which gives information about the events at the Second Temple), was misinformed by a Jew, who was as ignorant as his master. In recent times Dr. Gottheil of the Temple Emanuel, who claims to be a rabbi, and who has as much of an idea of the Talmud as I have of the Hottentots' language, has dared to say in one of his sermons that "the Jews never rejected Jesus," an untruth which even a newspaper would not dare to say, an untruth which is diametricaliy against those nineteen hundred witnesses, the nineteen hundred years of our dreadful history, an untruth proved by the would-be silencing stones which were thrown upon us by Christian mobs, and those stones are speaking aloud, "It is a lie." My present task is to clear up the mysterious riddle of Christi nity forever, by proving that such a man as is sketched in the New Testament neither existed nor was crucified, and that Christianity is a plant not grown upon Jewish soil at all. It is a plant whose root is to be traced in the land of the lotos, where the "light of Asia" of Buddha shone long before the "Star of the East" hallowed the head of the never-born child in Bethlehem.

ISAIAH AND HEROD.

We are holding judgment now upon a very serious case, a case which will baffle the eminent lawyers of the world, a case where a nation is charged to have cowardly murdered a helpless man known under the name of Jesus, alias the son of God, alias the son of man, a native of Nazareth and born in Bethlehem, crucified in Jerusalem eighteen centuries ago. Let the witnesses be arraigned before the bar, and let us carefully examine their characters and their evidence to enable us to deal properly with their charges and denials. The first who shall appear is the venerable seer Isaiah, the old fighter for freedom and liberty, to whom the writers of the gospel refer as having foretold the appearance of the crucified Jesus, alias the son of God.

Let us examine the passage of his foretelling which is the corner-stone of Christianity. The passage in question runs as follows: "Behold, the virgin will conceive and give birth to a child and name it Emanuel: butter and honey will he eat: he will know to despise bad and to choose good." That the passage is mistranslated every Hebrew scholar will admit.

First, there is not a word about a virgin. The seer says, "Behold the [alma] young woman [not virgin]" The Hebrew word for virgin is betulah, while here he speaks of a young woman, alma. Alma is the term for a married young woman; alma means also "hidden," for the married woman was hidden in the harem. The seer speaks of a young married woman who lived in his time, as he is pointing to her by saying, "Behold this woman [haalma] shall conceive." That the seer did not allude to the Holy Virgin Mary is clear as daylight.

Secondly, in the menu of Jesus, alias Christus, alias the son of God, wine and meat are the favorites, not butter and honey as foretold by the seer. And if he had known to choose good and despise bad, he never had defied the leaders of the Pharisees and run the risk of being crucified. The passage which Christians regard as the corner-stone of Christendom rests upon a very weak spot, upon a mistranslation.

The next witness in favor of Christianity is Johan the Baptizer, the supposedly foretold forerunner of Christus. This gentleman's existence is doubtful. He is not a historical figure, but was only created by the dreamers of the gospel to play the chief role in the new religious drama of their imagination.

Now, the Talmud is the great encyclopedic book of the Jews, whose first editors were the members of the great synod held at the returning from exile and closed before Mohammed's appearance. It is a book in which every religious event or distinguished person was noted and penned with such a historical truth that we must be astonished at it. The Talmud is a book upon which no party had an influence, for it gives the opinions even of those who are in opposition to its doctrine. I do not believe, like the orthodox Jew, that the Talmud is a book written by divine inspiration, but I believe that its "divine inspiration" was the truth guided by common sense. Where can we find a national religious book which shall place the opposer higher than the founder? It is the Talmud, which places its enemy, Beliam, in a higher plane than Moses, its law-giver. Now, if such a man as John the Baptist is not to be found there, it is sure that he belongs to the beings of an imaginary world of the four gospel writers. Nobody gives any account of John's birth except Mr. Lucas, but this evangelist seems to me to have been very ignorant of Jewish domestic affairs at that time, for he mentions in connection with John's birth a female prophet, by name Anna, belonging to the tribe of Aser. Can it be possible that there was a female prophet at the time of the Second Temple and no mention of her in the Talmud? Contrarily the Talmud declares that at the time of the Second Temple there was no more prophecy and only fools claimed its inspiration. Common sense inspired them; we have a gnomic saying of it as follows, "A sage is mightier than a prophet." Besides, there were no more "tribes." The Talmud declares that by the time of the returning from exile they did not know any longer of which tribe their parents were. The witnesshood of John is nothing worth, for such a man was unknown to have been living at that time.

Let us now consider the testimony of the traitor Josephus Flavius, where in his book there is a short item regarding the divinity of Jesus alias Christus. This short item is a forgery, and the forger made his trick in a very stupid way, for everyone who is acquainted with the stylistic character of Josephus's writings knows that he was a member of the various religious sects for the purpose of learning their teachings and customs. Now, if seventy years before him there existed a man of the name of Jesus who revealed to the world a new teaching, why did not Josephus give an account of his doctrines and of the customs and manners of his followers as he gives a description of other sects? The testimony of Flavius is a forgery, and it is not worth bothering with. Herod's child-slaughter on account of the baby God, as told in the gospel, is another daring forgery, forged to strengthen the weak spots of Christianity. It is true that Herod was a despotic ruler, capable of committing crimes, but a fool and such a believer in superstitious foretellings as to be afraid of a helpless baby the great Herod surely was not, for we know him in history as a very enlightened thinker who was not afraid to hang the leaders of all the existing religious sects. In the Talmud there is a chamber of horrors wherein all the crimes of Herod are exhibited, crimes which entitle him to the title of a "Jack the Ripper," as after he killed his beloved wife he kept her for a beastly purpose. If the child-slaughter of Bethlehem was the work of the crowned criminal, why does the Talmud not mention it among his other crimes, as we see that the Talmud blackens Herod more than the gospel? Besides, the history of the nations is silent in regard to this, a proof that the child-slaughter is a pure invention, invented by gospel writers in the third century for the purpose of promoting a divine messianic spectacle in the shape of the birth of a baby-God.

THE CHRISTUS OF THE GOSPEL.

The Christus of the gospel was born at Bethlehem seventy years before the destruction. His mother, the Virgin Mary, was fecundated by God, through the medium of his "Holy Ghost." The child was named Jesus, alias the son of God. He was sent on the earthly globe by his eternal father to suffer for humanity and to be crucified, so that he should clear and wash with his own blood the sins of all men. In consequence of the hunting for the baby-god by Herod's gendarmes, his virgin-mother fled with him into the land of the Nile, where for a short time they were hidden from Herod's wrath. After a short exile she returned home with her child, where it developed in Jewish wisdom and in the lore of the laws. Who was his master, or under whose teaching he was educated, the gospel does not tell. At the age of thirty he began his mission, by revealing to the nations the new tidings of his heavenly father. He drew the wrath of the Pharisees upon him, through his new doctrine, and he was crucified with two other common criminals. After having been on the cross about three hours, he was taken down and buried. He rose from the grave on the third day of his death to life again, according to the testimony of Mary. Afterward he appeared in his heavenly glory to his disciples. His twelve apostles, headed by Simon, alias Petrus, aided by the zealous Paulus, spread his teaching far and wide. This is the history of Christianity in brief, as narrated by the four evangelists in four varieties.

DOUBTFUL EVIDENCE.

If there is only one history of Christianity, why are there so many contradictions and variations in the narratives of the four writers? Everyone who is familiar with the gospel can see them. If Paulus played such a role in its development and was the pupil of the famous Rabbi Gamaliel, why is he not mentioned in the Talmud, as other learned apostates are mentioned? If Paulus and Petrus were inspired by one Holy Ghost, how could they quarrel and maintain argument in regard to a certain law? Where was the Holy Ghost?

The Jewish law orders that a person condemned to death shall hang on his spot the whole day long. How comes it that the crucified Christus was taken up after three hours?

HIS DOGMAS.

His new dogmas can be summed up in brief as follows: 1. To believe in him. 2. That he is the son of God. 3. To worship God by saying his "Lord's prayer." 4. His body was the temple of the Lord. 5 To love all. 6 To have one wife. 7. To believe in life hereafter. 8. That he was crucified to wash out with his blood the sins of men. These are the principles which the gospel claims were a new revelation to the Jews and were the reasons of rousing the wrath of the Pharisees upon him. The claims, as well as the reasons, are false ones, for every one who is versed in the Talmud knows that these dogmas, with the exception of two (to believe in him and that his death quitted the sins of men), were known to the Hebrews long before Christ, and were the dogmas of the Pharisees which the Sadducees opposed. Moses was the first who proclaimed to the Hebrews the fatherhood of God in heaven and the brotherhood of man on earth. Every man, according to the view of the ancient Hebrews, is the son of God. The famous Lord's prayer was not Christus's invention, for the same prayer is stated in the Talmud to have been in use in the synagogue service in the year 150, long before Christ. The Pharisees, at the return from exile, among other noble reform work, undertook a crusade against the superstition of the priests and the sacrifices. This prayer was their weapon against t e ox-killing which was the chief principle of the temple cult. That the body of man is the temple of the Lord was taught by Hillel the Great one hundred years before Christ. Hillel when taking a bath said: "I am performing a religious act of duty to keep my body, the abode and temple of my God, in a clean condition." "Love thy neighbor as thyself," is a biblical law. Bigamy was unknown to the Pharisees at the time of the Second Temple. "Marriage is made in heaven," is a very old Talmudical idea. (According to the Bible marriage is a business transaction and not sacred.) To look upon a strange woman is also a sin according to the teachings of the Pharisees. Now we see that his dogmas did not oppose the doctrines of the Pharisees. What, then, were they angry about?

THE TALMUDICAL CHRISTUS.

The name Jesus is not mentioned in the Talmud as a proper name. It is only the initials of the words, "Blotted out shall be his name." The Talmudical Christus is known under a Hebrew name which means "the son of a hidden gate or archway" (probably he was one of the unfortunate children which are left on doorways by their mothers). He was educated by the famous Rabbi Jehoshud ben Perashya, who lived about one hundred and sixty years before the destruction. For a misbehavior in the college his master threw him out with both hands (so the Talmudical version). Despised by his school friends, he started for Egypt, the Eldorado of the Magian charlatans at that time. After a life of adventure in the land of the Nile, he returned to Palestine as a professional Magian showman, where he gave his performances, as playing with serpents, making things disappear, and other tricks, to the astonished stupid masses. But as such performance was against the Jewish religion, for it helps superstition to develop, he was requested to leave his work. For not obeying and despising the request of the sages, he was sentenced to be crucified. On the day before Easter, he, with his four helpers, Mathias, Theodosius, Johannes, and another, were crucified (the four mentioned which shared his lot on the cross are perhaps the four gospel writers). This is, in brief, the history of the life and death of the Talmudical Christus, who lived one hundred and sixty years before the destruction, and was crucified at the age of thirty-five years, as narrated in a simple and reasonable way, so that we must say that the Christus of the gospel is a legendary figure.

A DRY BUT SENSIBLE RELIGION.

The Jewish religion, as proclaimed by Moses, is a dry but a very sensible one. The Jehova of the ancient Hebrews was not a dude like Jovis of the heathens, who passed his time eating and drinking, and murdering his relatives in divinity. The Jehova of Moses was a God of labor, a God who worked six days very hard till he worked out the world—so hard a task, indeed, that he was obliged to rest on the seventh day of his industrious labor. The Jehova of Moses is powerful enough to realize his will without needing mortal arms to enforce it. The Jehova of Moses does not tolerate any rival power, and in his kingdom the blackmailer Satan was unknown. The kingdom of Jehova is life, not death. His Tophet, as well as his Eden, are placed on earth. In the books of Moses there is not a single hint about the "nether world." The various laws are only concerning life and health. "Maintain the tree and eat its fruit," is the gnomic sentence of the ancient Hebrew religion. But the ever-stupid and never-satisfied human brain revolted against a sensible religion, for the stupid mass is amused more by a fancy dance round a glittering golden calf than by walking in the light of the pure and dry Jehova cult. The religious revolt against the Jehova cult broke out at the time of the Second Temple in the era of our narrative.

JUDAISM IN A DILEMMA.

Wise in their generation were the Jewish statesmen to maintain the freedom of their country through political tricks, despite the despotic supremacy of Persian kings. Heroes were the Jewish generals on the battle-field, where with iron brushes they swept away from their native ground the dust of the mighty Greek invader. But there was an enemy whom both were powerless to get rid of. It was the "influence of strange thoughts." You can shoot a whole nation to death, but you cannot kill a single thought. The influence of the Persian religion on one side, which has affected the better class—the doctrine of Zoroaster, that there is a god of light, Ormuzd, and a god of darkness and of evil—this doctrine, which at first seems to solve the riddle of life, has affected many a Talmudical sage. The influence of Hellas's poetical religion is on the other side. The masses of those whose brains are in the stomach and taste in the eyes—the beauty of a Venus and the charm of a Minerva hav aroused the slumbering passions of these. The noisy feasts of Bacchus and the alarming Saturnalia, with the bright prospect of life hereafter to walk in brightness of Elysium's shade, hav arrested the feelings of the people, and the desire for a new religion is manifested in all directions of public life. To free the nation from the evil influence of Greek and Persian religion, the sages of the Talmud start a new clever "move" in the Jehova cult.

DIVINE WOMANHOOD.

Das ewig weibliche zieht uns hinan (Faust).

The "move" of the sages was calculated to kill with one shot two birds; in other words, to blend the dual god of Zoroaster with the divine womanhood of Hellas, a new Jewish creation of a deity in the fashion of Hebrew scripture. The "glory of God," so often mentioned in the Bible, was explained as the "divine womanhood" of Jehova, a divine womanhood which under another name plays a great role in the Cabbalah. The masses as well as the classes were satisfied, for they had now a god two in one and the charm of a divine womanhood. The Jewish proverb, "It is as beautiful as the Shechina," resembles the Greek saying, "It is as beautiful as Venus." The new teaching was the foreshadowing of Christianity!

A RELIGIOUS DELIRIUM.

The appearance of a "divine womanhood" on the Jewish theological stage caused a religious delirium among the Hebrews. Proof of it is the many sects which peopled at the Second Temple the country of Palestine. In addition to the religious delirium there was a political irritation too, for the nation longed for a hero who would be able to free it from the growing supremacy of Rome. The mismarriage of politics with religion gave birth to the illegitimate child of a Christus. This new personage, the creation of their brains, was honored and glorified in tales and legendary poems for political purposes. Bethlehem, the birthplace of David, was venerated by the nation, and this place they pointed out as the birthplace of the new David who would restore the country to its first glory. It is curious to note a narrative of the Talmud concerning the legend of the messiah's birth. It is narrated in a very humoristic tone. Once an Arab with a Hebrew traveled through Bethlehem, passing a stable where they heard the voice of an ox. The Arab said to the Hebrew, "Hear! thy messiah is now born." Next year at their returning the same thing happened. The Arab said, "Now thy temple is destroyed; messiah is dead." The mockery of the tale needs not explanation. (Was the Arab perhaps one of the three kings of the Moorland?) The religious delirium and confusion of thought was so great that no one understood the other. While some sects sharped their knives and stilettoes against the Romans, the others were busy preparing talismans and magic spells to fight the spirits and demons, the soldiers of Satan. While the ones looked to free their metropolis, Jerusalem, from the stranger, the others directed their eyes to the heavenly Jerusalem with its gates of pearls and doors of gold. Besides the mixed multitude of sects, the nation was divided into two great parties, the one longing for earthly freedom, the other desiring the slavery of heaven.

A SOCIETY OF PHILOSOPHERS.

The Talmud tells of disputes and religious arguments which often occurred between the sages or rabbis, and the philosophers. Rabbin Gamaliel said to a rabbi, "Let us pay a visit to our friend the philosopher." It seems that they lived on peaceful terms with the sages of the Talmud. Judging from the arguments we see, the "philosophical sect" adopted only the "ethical teachings" of the Bible. The "Sermon on the Mount" which is ascribed to Jesus, alias Christus, seems to be a copy of the book of the "philosophical sect." Another feature of the philosophers is that they admired, perhaps believed, the dual God of Zoroaster. The "Logos," or the Word, plays a great role in their philosophical system, as in that of their brothers in Egypt of the Jewish Hellenistic school. The "Logos" was smuggled into the gospel by Johannes the Evangelist to complete the disorder. The word "philosopher" means "lover of wisdom."

SUMMING UP.

From all above-mentioned we see: 1. That Jesus of Nazareth, born in Bethlehem, alias Christus, alias the son of God, was neither born nor crucified. 2. A crucified one lived a hundred and sixty years before the destruction, of the name of Ben Stadi. He was convicted for the attempt to establish superstition. It may be that his friends and admirers developed a new cult to his memory, hallowed by mystic legends through the confusion of religious ideas. 3. The gospel writers, as well as the apostles, are not mentioned in the Talmud. 4. Why does the gospel not mention the names of the sages with whom Jesus argued? 5. His teachings were not new to the Hebrews, with the exception of two—to believe on him, and that his death quitted the sins of man (the Bible says everyone dies for his own sin). These two dogmas are not of Jewish origin, and we shall trace their root in the far country of India, from which soil Christianity developed.

SOLDIERS' MISUNDERSTANDINGS.

When Alexander the Great started to conquer the "world," he invaded Palestine. In Palestine, through the clever behavior of the Jewish statesmen, an alliance between Greeks and Jews was the result of the peace. When Alexander started for India the high priest gave him ten thousand Jewish soldiers to take share in the invasion. The impression which the new country made upon the Greek and Jewish soldiers we can imagine. The silent priests, the big pagodas, the strange customs, these all roused in them the wish to be informed about all, as the habit of strangers is. Through ignorance of the Hindoo language, or through mistranslating by the interpreters, the information was a great misunderstanding. They were, for instance, informed that the supreme god, Ramah (in Hebrew, "high"), is a god in three deities, as Brahmah, Siva, Vishnu; that the deities often descended to earth to animate various human bodies to exhibit to the world how to reach salvation and be able to enter the Narvana (in Hebrew, "light;" Narvana is the Eden of the Hindoo). So, the manifestations of Vishnu were Ramah, Chrishna, and Buddha. The Greeks, as they cannot pronounce the sh, pronounced the deity Chrishna like Chrisna. So the Jews pronounced Vishnu like Ishu (the Hebrew name for Jesus, which means "salvation." Or perhaps they heard of the god Jose, which sounds like the Hebrew Josha, also the name of Jesus). And so the Chrisna of the Greek became Christus. They were informed that the god animated the body of Buddha for humanity's sake, and the man-god, Buddha, was heir of a great empire, possessor of a harem with four hundred houris, who left all the pomp and luxury and instead of his purple dressed himself as a beggar to live the life of a pauper. This self-denial, the killing and crucifixion of his earthly human passion, showed to the Hindoos that they shall live also such a life, for only by such a way would they be admitted into the Narvana, the place of eternal light and salvation. Such was the information. The misunderstanding was the contrary of it. They understood that Buddha crucified or killed himself (not his passion), to bring salvation to mankind at large, and his believers will enter on this account the celestial Eden, the Narvana; and such was their notion of a suffering messiah. They were informed that every five thousand years the god animated a human body to show to mankind the way of purity and to be their Buddha, their mentor. They misunderstood it by thinking that the messiah after his killing will appear again to restore his kingdom (the thousand years, promised by the gospel, of the second coming of Christ). With such a messianic delirium, added to by other superstitions and lies, as it is the habit of soldiers and adventurers to magnify every little thing, they returned home to their respective countries. To the Hebrew party which strove for a heavenly kingdom this messianic tale was very welcome, but their leaders were persecuted by the other party, which was fighting for earthly freedom, and the party to prevent a national uprising hanged or crucified the leaders, who were hallowed with the messianic glory after their death, and so it may be that the Christus of the gospel who lived seventy years before the destruction is the dreamer and rebel Ben Stadi, who lived a hundred and sixty years before the destruction. The messianic idea brought from India also stirred a revolt in the land of Hellas against those lazy dudes, the numberless gods of the Olymph. It was a light thing to create an imaginary figure and dress him in historical clothes, as the religious confusions and political irritations were extreme. Now the riddle is also solved why Greeks and Jews were the first to accept Christianity, and that is the reason of Paulus who said, first to the Jew, then to the Greek, "The great structure of Christianity is built upon two corner-stones—upon mistranslation and upon misunderstanding."

Another Cryptogram.

Occupied somewhat with the subject of the Shakspere cryptogram, it happened that Ben Jonson's "Every Man in His Humor" fell into my hands. Having read in Donnelly's book somewhere about the strange fact of the titles of several of Shakspere's plays being found in some play of Shakspere, and also the titles of some other plays not as yet ascribed to Bacon, among others "York and Lancaster," it occurred to me, while reading the prolog of "Every Man," etc., and coming across the names "York and Lancaster," that possibly there might be some cipher story unsought up through that comedy. I was surprised to find in the thirty five-line prolog not only "York and Lancaster," but "Comedy of Errors" and "Tempest." What may be found by a prolonged, careful search I dare not assert, but a few minutes' reading convinced me that some mystery lies hid within the words of that play. The hand of Bacon or Shakspere is manifest in many lines. For instance:

> To make a child new swaddled to proceed
> Man, and then shoot up, in one beard and weed.
> Nor rolled bullet heard,
> To say it thunders, nor tempestuous drum
> Rumbles.

The speeches of Knowell in the first scene and of Kitely in the second act hav many lines truly Shak—or Baconian, which you will. Take the following out of many similar examples. Speaking of Wellbred, one of them says:

> Methought he bore himself in such a fashion,
> So full of man and sweetness in his carriage;
> And what was chief, it showed not borrowed on him,
> But all he did became him as his own.
> But now his course is so irregular.
> . . . . . .
> He makes my house here common as a mart
> For giddy humor and diseased riot.

Short as is the above quotation, we can find the very title of the play in it, "Man in his Humor." And looking through the play, we find "Every Man in His Humor" more than once, and the word "man" often has a forced, unnatural place. It is very suspicious, "thinks I to myself," and I will look farther. Here is "Moor" used several times, and "Venice" also. Can it be possible that Othello is mentioned? There is one strange expression:

> From the Bordello it might come as well.

It will be difficult to make out the first part of the name, but here we hav it, "O the muses;" again, "O the Lord." Upon my word we are making headway. Is there anything like Shakspere to be found?

> And shake the fever off that thus shakes me.
> I could eat my very spur—leathers.

Or, if you prefer "spir," you hav "conspiracy," "conspiring," and several other "shakes" in the play. Evidently Shakspere or his double had a hand in this. If now Bacon can be found, we are a made "cryptogramist," if not man. By heavens, it is! Yes, as we liv, there is Bacon, or his > Ghost of Rasher Bacon!

> Roger Bacon thou wouldst say.
> I say Rasher Bacon.

See scene 3, act i, "Every Man in His Humor." What strange, senseless language! But is there a Francis? Surely, here one Cash cries without any reason whatever, "Francis! Martin! ne'er a one to be found now?" Evidently the name is affected. See act iii, scene 2. We hav the "Merchant of Venice" in the speech of Cob, scene 3, act i, and in those of Bobadil at the end of scene 4, "venue," "orifice;" besides, the name "Venice" is found elsewhere more than once. "Love's Labor Lost" is found. Act iv, scene 1,

> As you in beauty do exceed love's mother.

In the last scene, "You hav saved me the labor;" and "I hav lost my purse," scene 2, act ii—note the play on the word "purse" and the name "Henry" for "Henry Perce," Bacon's private secretary. "Taming of the Shrew" is found once or twice in the play. We hav "Tears of the Muses," a poem celebrated in that age and having a mysterious reference to the author of Shakspere's plays, and which has been a puzzle to criticism.

> O eyes! No eyes, but fountains fraught with tears.
> O the Muses! Is't not excellent?

There was a play-writer of that time of the name of Marlow of whom it is said his genius was almost equal to Shakspere's. He wrote several plays, notably one entitled "Tamburlane." We find the name of Marlow several times in this play of Jonson's and also the name Tamburlane. One Green was very significantly mixed up in the affairs of Shakspere, and we find his name in the play. "Rape of Lucrece" and "Venus and Adonis" can be found, also "Twelfth Night," and several other names of plays. Perhaps if one had the earliest editions of this comedy he could find some clue whereby to "unfold a tale."

News and Notes.

Crookston is situated in one of the most fertil sections of the Northwest. It is a prosperous city of about four thousand inhabitants. It is the county seat of Polk county. Its public buildings are fine. It has educational facilities of a high order. However, it has thirteen churches, and therefore is not all that it might be. Still, there is a large Liberal element. My audiences increased every night. About three hundred were present at the closing lecture. The campaign has been a success. These were the first lectures of the kind ever given in the place. I believe I found a warm welcome, and the three days I spent at Crookston were simply delightful. The weather was lovely, and the music and glory of harvest were in the air. Everybody was happy. Polk county will take in about $5,000,000 this year for its wheat crop. This will set things going and make the future bright for the whole land. One farm of one hundred and sixty acres near Crookston produced five thousand bushels. Wheat at present is eighty-four cents, with a good chance of going to $1. This is a nice little income.

My friends P. M. Ringdal and Elias Steenerson took special pains to giv me a long drive over the surrounding country, and the prospects with glittering harvest fields were magnificent. I would like to be a farmer just about this time. It is so romantic—the big machines whirling out the golden grain, and the vast elevators ready to receive it and giv back the jingling dollars. The whole Northwest seems at present like a gorgeous festival scene.

Elias Steenerson introduced me at the lectures, and the county paper remarked that it was a strange performance at a Freethought lecture that Elias should introduce Samuel. It was quite a biblical affair indeed.

There are six stalwart brothers of the Steenersons and they make a host for the Liberal cause.

J. O. Sundet has been in this country since about 1870. He is on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and every now and then sends for $25 worth of Liberal books and pamphlets and distributes them with a lavish hand.

Judge F. Ives has been a pioneer of our cause and a reader of the Investigator for over thirty years.

Ole Hagan is one of the representativ Scandinavian Liberals. He has been one of the leading writers in the Red River Dalen, a Scandinavian journal published here. He has recently written a book on "Church and State," which has been eagerly read by his countrymen, it being published in their language. It is a radical Freethought book, and thousands of copies hav been sold. It is exciting great interest, and the Christians think it ought to be burnt up, since they cannot answer its arguments. It is one of the best books in any Scandinavian language.

More than half of the population of this country are Scandinavians, and among them are many Liberals. Still, the church element is strong.

F. O. Surtat formerly lived in Chicago and was a Liberal there; and as long ago as 1869 there was a Scandinavian Liberal organization in Chicago and it was the first organization west of Boston to celebrate Paine's birthday, Mr. Surtat tells me. Is this so? I guess it is, and it is quite an honor for the Scandinavians of Chicago to thus take the lead. Was there any celebration of Paine's birthday outside of Boston before 1869? Who can wrest the honor from the Scandinavian host? Dr. G. C. Paoldy, about the oldest physician in Chicago to-day, was the first president of this Chicago association.

I was pleased to meet at Crookston the Rev. Mr. Hoyt of the Episcopal church. He is a liberal-minded gentleman, and we could talk together without friction. Of course we did not agree. The extremes of human thought met in our conversation. He accepts the philosophy of Hegel, which I do not. I take the very opposit—the philosophy of Hume and Hamilton. To one who can accept Hegelianism it is delightful—a dreamy and beautiful religion with all the hard outlines of orthodoxy lost in luminous dreams. Hegel is the last refuge of the honest and liberal-hearted Christian. When this "infinit subject" and "God-consciousness" are surrendered to pure reason then the Christian religion loses its golden twilight, and disappears in the day of science.

I enrolled a goodly number of Freethinkers in the ranks of THE TRUTH SEEKER. With those already mentioned are Peter Cornelius, Wm. Munch, Thos. Lockeed, Louis Bergquist, H. Steenerson—and so with the golden harvests of Crookston will ever mingle the rays of intellectual progress. J. W. Jenning, Capt. Marion D. Haltested, Halberg, and others are also in the advance corps.

I must thank J. O. Sundet and Halberg for the beautiful flag and lovely flowers which ornamented the platform, symbols of our hopes.

I was also gratified to meet D. P. R. Strong, editor of the Polk county Review, of East Grand Forks, who came to Crookston to attend the lectures. He is a pronounced Freethinker and is not afraid to stand by the colors. With him from East Grand Forks was Charlie Barto, W. N. Dixon, and H. West—all comrades in the army of reform.

Crookston has thus been a bright spot in the journey of the Secular pilgrim. With the vast and glistening fields mingles the splendor of the dawn of liberty.

I leave Crookston on Friday evening. Fortunately I hav comrade Strong with me until I reach Winnipeg junction about 10 P.M. Here I hav to wait three hours for the train west. Early in the morning Jamestown flashes upon my sleepy sight in a somewhat rolling country, and all about this section of North Dakota I see the innumerable wheat stacks—millions of them—and Jamestown smiles in its prosperity. I find a small but stalwart band of Liberals at Jamestown. I giv my first lecture in the courthouse on Saturday evening. This is an elegant building, and if I only had a full house it would be a pleasure to speak in it. However, the audience is fit, though few. I hav the honor of being introduced by a lady this time, and a Putnam at that, from the Mayflower stock, Miss Helen G. Putnam. She is Unitarian minister in the Dakotas, is doing an excellent work in the way, and of course is broad-minded and without the shackles of creed, for it is not every Unitarian minister who would introduce one of my ilk. In this case it was a Unitarian and a woman who did the daring act. This shows that woman has both brain and heart for the front of the world's progress. Miss Putnam is a real worker—she does not take to the fashionable and splendid church buildings, but to the school-houses, private dwellings, log-cabins, dug-outs, and the unfenced universe besides. Although she is entirely theistic, and we differ on that point, yet on the side of humanity we thoroughly agree, and the platform of the Demands of Liberalism is common ground. It was a pleasure to meet and join hands with this brave and generous woman, whose spirit is broader than any creed or name.

I lecture on Sunday afternoon and Sunday evening. On Sunday evening I hav an excellent audience. Miss Putnam and Mrs. John Burns assist me with music. Mrs. Burns is an enthusiastic worker. Mr. John Burns, formerly of the Catholic church, is one of our foremost Liberals here, and makes things move, with generous devotion to the cause. J. T. Eager is also a comrade true, and was among the first to giv me welcome to this field, where Bell and Remsburg hav been before. C. R Flint is in our ranks of the Investigator column, and C. J. Warren and A. J. Warren and families, who came seven and ten miles from the country to attend the lecture in spite of the busy season. I should hav had many more at the lecture if it had not been that the crops were both big and late. Even the women go into the fields these days to gather the glorious harvests. This is a blessed year for Dakota. For two or three seasons there hav been only seven and eight bushels to the acre. This season there are twenty-five and thirty bushels to the acre. It is a jubilant picture that greets the eye over these wide extended prairies. L. H. Shipley, D. Goodman, E. E. Martin, Richard Long, with Eager and Burns, are on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the tide of Freethought will advance, although there are ten churches in this city of about twenty-five hundred people and there is much to contend against; but our friends at this point mean to keep the flag a-flying.

The Presbyterians hav built a big college here, which presents a rather imposing appearance upon the hills just outside the town. The school facilities here are excellent. The courthouse is a noble piece of architecture. Jamestown is on the "Jem river," as they call it, which flows through a prosperous valley far down into South Dakota. It is a handsome place, and with the splendors of nature about, it will not always be under the shadow of orthodoxy. The morning light is coming.

Jamestown, Sept. 6, 1891. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Portland, Ore., Convention.

To the Liberals of the State of Oregon: I hav done all in my power to make our coming congress the best ever held. The time has come for you to help finish the work. Are you ready and willing? I imagin I can hear you responding, "Willing and ready, what shall I do?" Secure, without delay, a notice in all the papers in your county of the time and place of the convention, telling the people it comes before the close of the great exposition at Portland and that they will hav reduced fare.

Giv out the time and place at every public meeting in your county until it meets.

Circulate every card and circular which comes into your hands about the meeting.

Invite every Liberal, every half Liberal, and everybody else to come and hear the eminent speakers who will address the people on Secular government.

Then come yourself, and bring from $1 to $5 with you more than you need, thus returning thanks for the best crop ever raised in Oregon.

I hav invited so many speakers that I cannot now giv you the program. But Mrs. Cochran, the mother orator of this coast, will deliver the opening address and an orchestra of children will discourse music.

Remember it will be held on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 3d, 4th, and 5th of October.

C. BEAL, President.

The Secretary's View of It.

To the Liberals of Oregon: From present outlook we are to hav a splendid array of speakers at the Third Annual Congress of the Oregon State Secular Union to be held at Portland, Ore., October 3d, 4th, and 5th, and now let me urge, upon our Oregon Liberals especially, the necessity of attending this convention.

President Beal and his assistants hav put forth their best efforts to make this a representativ gathering of free men and free women, and the presence of Oregon's thousands of Liberals is necessary to impress upon the minds of the general public that we are in earnest in our demands.

The lack of attention shown by the state legislature to our petition for the taxation of church property should show you the necessity of more earnest work in this direction. From the correspondence I had with members of the last legislature I am convinced that if we Liberals simply show the strength which we undoubtedly possess, respect will be shown our demands.

The general public seems to be ignorant of what we want—they know little of the American Secular Union or our state organization. Hundreds of people during the past year hav asked me the meaning of the badge-pin I wear, and when the principles of our organization hav been explained to them hav shown their interest by asking for literature on the subject of church taxation, etc.

Now, what we want at our next congress is the presence of the Liberals from every part of the state, that we can arrange a plan of campaign for effectiv work not only in regard to the taxation of church property but also the exclusion of all religious exercises from the public schools.

Do the Liberals of Oregon know that their state superintendent of instruction recommends in his school law instructions the repeating of the Lord's prayer and reading of the scriptures as an opening exercise for our public schools, and are they willing to sit idly by while his suggestion is carried out? I know from my own experience as teacher in the public schools that there is much work for us to accomplish here.

Judging from the result of their work, I know that there are hundreds of teachers in your schools who spend most of their time making their pupils fit subjects for their imaginary heaven, regardless of the fact that in doing so they are dwarfing the child's intellect, and making it less fitted for the duties required of it here. Before this convention, then, visit your school and ascertain what is being done there.

Be prepared to tell us at this congress the names and addresses of the directors and teachers who authorize or hold religious exercises in our public schools; you will thus enable the Secular Union to take steps which may result in the discontinuance of such exercises. Do not neglect this, for there is nothing of more importance than the correct education of our children.

Again, this convention gives us an excellent opportunity of becoming acquainted with one another; to enjoy a good social time, and when work-hours are over, to visit the points of interest in Oregon's metropolis.

The date of the convention was changed to reap the advantage of the reduced railroad fare during the Mechanics' Exposition; this is another feature which will interest and instruct you.

Think this matter over. It is important that every Liberal, every Spiritualist, every man and woman who wishes to maintain freedom of thought and speech, should meet with us.

"In union there is strength," and it is the object of this congress to so unite or organize our army of Oregon Liberals that we will be strong enough to successfully meet the enemy's encroachments on our liberties. So again I say, come!

KATIE KEHM SMITH,
Cor. Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

Reflections.

As long as I can remember I hav been troubled more or less by a lack of dignity. Almost invariably I find it very difficult to maintain a respectable appearance of seriousness upon grave occasions, even being sometimes possessed by an almost uncontrolable desire to laugh at a funeral service—though at other times unable to catch the point of a droll story and remaining as dumb as an oyster while my companions are vainly struggling to retain the buttons upon their garments.

My mother's characteristic trait of intense reserve manifested itself through my person in the form of a superabundant amount of bashfulness. My father was a Liberal longer than I can remember, and as he was the guide in home affairs it necessarily followed as a natural consequence that I became a Liberal, too. I remember trying to think out how it could be that reasoning human beings would look to an imaginary great big man up in the sky and in one breath detail to him their woes, pray for a favorable change in their temporal affairs, and express their willingness to submit to his decrees. It struck my youthful mind as superlativly absurd, and so severe was the blow that I hav never recovered. I gradually came to look upon the whole affair as a stupendous joke, and I hav been endeavoring all my life to get others to see it in the same light. More or less success has attended my efforts in this direction.

But as regards my bashfulness—which, by the way, my wife says is rapidly disappearing—all the efforts of my worthy parent and well-meaning relativs were unavailing in correcting this trait, and even to-day I labor under more or less difficulty on its account. It is therefore with no inconsiderable degree of hesitation that I appear before the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I do believe that were it not for the fact that I expect to meet many of the friends who hav known me through Freethought I should be tempted to decline the very polite and friendly invitations I hav received to contribute to its columns. But the thought of meeting and greeting those who hav been with us during the years of battle on the Pacific coast spurs me to a point of daring which would astonish my own mother; and if I fail to maintain a tone of dignity compatible with the staid character of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I trust that its readers will pardon me and find consolation in the thought that we all learn to do better as we grow older.

I doubt not that these lines will reach all the friends of Freethought, and I desire to invite them to join in the reorganized ranks and aid in continuing the battle against superstition. We must keep at work. The liberties of the people depend upon the unremitting efforts of a few. And in this thought alone is found, alas, too often the only incentiv to continued effort on the part of those activly engaged in the Freethought battle. With the forces concentrated more effectiv work may be done, and I want every reader of this suggestion to indorse it by a subscription to the paper it appears in.

There is an impression both at home and abroad that San Francisco is a very wicked city. This may or may not be so. It, like everything else, makes a great deal of difference how one looks at it. People come here from the steady-going Eastern states and are shocked at what they are pleased to term depravity. Inheriting a puritanical tendency, which has been cultivated by educational influences and by environments, they see only wickedness in the innocent revelry which meets them everywhere they go in this city. Picnics, ball-games, excursions, field sports, dances, and theaters are on the San Francisco list of Sunday amusements, and the sedate New England church-goer sees in these diversions only pathways leading to perdition. In his fertil brain he conjures up a frightful picture of the future, and, horror-stricken at the imagery of his own brain, he hastens to find a friend who will sympathize with him, and together they at once concert plans to put a stop to the revelry. By law, as by a tailor a garment is cut to order, these thoughtless men, these heedless women, and these laughing children must be made moral By statutes recorded on the books of the state and enforced by the strength of government, they must be made fit subjects for the kingdom of heaven. Without a plentiful supply of such man-made safeguards, his satanic majesty, commonly called the devil, will go ahead of the parent said to reside in heaven, and will knock the old man's calculations as to the number of seats he shall reserve for the use of his subjects at that concert which is to be opened by Gabriel and to continue thereafter unceasingly, into a cocked hat. So the Sunday-law agitation continues. Always there are some old fossils and some young cranks who keep up the absurd fight, despite every dictate of experience and common sense.

Giving an account of the recent attempted seizure of the steamer Panama, on account of there being several political refugees from Central America on board, the Chronicle says that a man-of-war should be detailed to prevent similar outrages, and advises that it should be "a representativ vessel of our new navy, which will put the fear of God into the hearts of the rulers of these petty republics, so that they will never again heap indignities on the American flag." This method of inspiring a "fear of God," although not exactly new, should prove very effectiv as long as powder and shot hold out. The Chronicle seems to excel in peculiar descriptions. An example occurs in a report from the Spiritualist camp-meeting now in progress at Oakland. One of the "test-mediums" is said to hav appeared upon the platform wearing "a white tie, a gold scarf-pin, and a well-satisfied smile." Rather a limited wardrobe, to be sure, but as this is a warm climate, and it may also be possible that the gentleman is rehearsing his part in the future, where, we are told, woolen fabrics are of little value, he is excusable so long as his auditors do not object to what he presents them. The report goes on to state that the cable and electric car lines are realizing many nickels from enthusiastic Spiritualists; that a corresponding number of dimes are deposited at the camp gateway, and that the tests given were rather unsatisfactory. All of which goes to show that the meeting is proving as much of a success as usual.

A recent statement made by the Rev. J. Saunders Reed, of San Francisco, may be of some value to those interested in comparativ statistics. "In every city are several circles," said he. "The smallest is made up of church-goers, a larger one is composed of moral and honest persons, a third, still larger, of the intemperate and vicious, and the fourth of pauperism and drunkenness, and a last, greater than any of the others, of heathens, to whom the ideals, practices, and conversation of religion are things unknown."

Mr. Reed's assertion that the second circle is composed of "moral and honest" people reflects rather disadvantageously upon the first circle; still, as that is the smallest, probably it matters very little anyway. However, this sort of thing must be very unsatisfactory to the pious church-goer—that is, providing he has brains enough to reflect upon the matter at all.

We hav with us for a brief engagement the "divine Sarah," and people are crowding the largest theater to listen to her. They do say wicked things about the great actress still; every public character must suffer more or less, and no matter what may be the private character of Bernhardt, the fact remains that she is a talented actress, is feasted and feted wherever she goes, has traveled over many lands and has an extensiv knowledge of human nature. A local reporter broached the Sunday question the other evening, and while putting the finishing touches to her stage toilet, she said: "The Sabbath is a wet blanket in England, a damp one in Australia, and wants airing in certain Eastern cities of America. In San Francisco, however, it is gay, it is alive. People don't go to sleep merely because it is Sunday. They like to liv and be pretty and smart, and come out and amuse themselvs, instead of hiding themselvs because it is a Sabbath day. Yes, it is charming, and I must say that out of France the only Sundays worth living in are yours here in San Francisco." Then she alluded to a bygone Sunday in some good old Blue-law town and shuddered. Then she laughed and flitted away to the stage, where the curtain was already rising.

To be sure there is another side to the picture. There must always be a reverse. There must be shadows as well as sunshine to make a perfect picture. These are here. And the brilliance of the light marks more distinctly the blackness of the shadows. But there is less pious cant, less social hypocrisy, in San Francisco than in any city it was ever my fortune to linger in, and I am of the opinion that Madam Bernhardt was not far out of the way in her diagnosis of the case.

It is a question how long this spirit of freedom will remain unfettered. The clergy are trying to turn public opinion against it. Their fight is for bread and butter. They shrink from the prospect of "sawing wood and saying nothing." They know that the point once conceded means annihilation of their creeds. The general public is too fond of amusement to giv up its weekly holiday unless compelled to do so. The great majority will not voluntarily immure itself in gloomy churches and listen to dreary sermons unless it feels the prod of the state behind and sees the flames of hell ahead.

One of the leading ministers of this city has been exercising the gray matter of his brain in making an estimate of the church income as compared with that of theaters. He has discovered that the proportion is about one to eighteen in favor of the theaters. He declares himself a sort of high license advocate, denouncing the ten-cent theaters as the most soul-destroying influences in the city. It irritates these religionists to look upon the emptied benches in their churches and note the sign "Standing room only" displayed at the theaters on Sunday evenings, and they would willingly enforce to its utmost limit any statute against Sunday amusements which might be enacted. They will use every means within their power to obtain laws prohibiting the pleasures which Californians hav been wont to indulge in upon the weekly holiday made popular by custom.

Public sentiment has very little to do with the enactment of prohibitory laws. The people principally interested hear practically nothing of the statutes until some ecclesiastical tyrant clothed in the robe of the state comes along and makes an arrest.

Nativ Californians do not realize what a Sunday law means. They laugh half incredulously when told of the solemn New England Sunday. The "forty-niners" left their Eastern homes before the church attained so much temporal power, and know nothing, except by hearsay, of the tyranny it exercises. It is the puritanical element drifting westward that is agitating this question. Its representativs are appalled by the mass of pleasure-seekers which fills our parks, steamers, picnic grounds, and theaters every Sunday, and declare that something must be done to put an end to such levity.

It will not do for Liberals to remain indifferent, trusting to general laws of progress for safety. A few conspirators manipulate the law-making machinery and make slaves of an uninformed or misinformed public. We must watch; we must work; the societies should exist in more than name only. The Portland, Ore., convention, October 3d, 4th, 5th; Putnam's lecture in this city, October 11th, and the lecture season to follow—these are blows for freedom. Do not forget them. F. L. BROWNE.

Ministers in a Squall.

World Interview with the Blackbird's Captain.

"There is not another boat in the world that has gone down the bay to meet more distinguished persons than the Blackbird. From her gang-planks hav stepped aboard celebrities of all ranks, professions, and nationalities whose first greeting to the United States was on board this little boat."

"Which parties afford you the most amusement?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, I had more real fun with a party of ministers and their friends who went down the bay on the Blackbird to meet a steamer on which was Talmage. The party was composed of men and women, of a quiet, orderly class, and they had their own little jokes and innocent fun. When they first came aboard it was 'How do you do, Brother So-and-So?' or 'Sister So-and-So?' There was a good deal of handshaking and kissing all around. Then, after we had started, there were a prayer and psalm-singing, but as we neared Sandy Hook the fun began.

"The Blackbird was pretty well loaded down, and when we started the weather was all that could be desired. It had been a hot, sultry day in the city, and all aboard were rejoicing over the expected delightful run down to the Hook. All went well until we got near our destination, when a sudden squall struck us and it blew great guns, raising a heavy sea. The wind fairly shrieked, the rain came down in buckets, the lightning was wicked and the thunder crashed, peal after peal following each other in rapid succession. I was in the wheelhouse with the pilot, and the Blackbird was going her prettiest. She just rolled about and tossed, met every big sea, climbed up or dashed through mountains of waves, then went way down, just as the brave, stanch little boat can.

"In the saloon and cabins was a panic-stricken crowd of men and women, the like of which I never saw. Some seemed to hav absolutely gone crazy with fright, and howled, cried, and prayed for the Lord to save them. Some of them got in bunches, clung to each other, and, when a sea would strike their side of the boat, over they all went. It was no use for the officers of the boat and men to tell them there was no danger and that it was only a common squall. They all thought they were going to the bottom, and it was fun to see the men rolling about with life-preservers tied around them in all kinds of ways, while the women were rolling about screaming with fright. I was sorry for them, but I thought the clergymen, who preach so much about being always ready to meet death, should certainly not hav been afraid of a squall."

WE will furnish free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. A Freethinker of good address, man or woman, out of work, could make good salary selling this book in any town of fairly Liberal inhabitants.

W. S. BELL'S address during October will be Des Moines, Iowa.

S. P. PUTNAM'S lecture appointments for September and October are as follows: Palouse City, Wash., September 19th, 20th; Pasco, Wash., 22d, 23d; Nanaimo, B. C., 26th; Wellington, B.C., 27th, 28th; Snohomish, Wash., 30th; West Ferndale, Wash., October 1st, 2d; Portland convention, 3d, 4th, 5th; Grant's Pass, Ore., 7th, 8th; San Francisco, 11th. Will lecture in California through the months of October, November, December, and January, state convention January 29th.

Infidel Funerals, Safety from Insult.

The infamous outrage perpetrated at every opportunity by ministers gloating in the performance of their religious mummeries over the dead body of the Infidel, whom when in health and full possession of faculties they never dared to discuss religious topics with, should be rendered impossible.

Unfortunately, even when the wife is Liberal, heart-broken, demented by grief, she is apt to yield to the insidious solicitation or be overwhelmed by the dictation of the minister or his satellites, who are ever ready at such times "to creep into the house and lead silly women captiv," and once permission is obtained for the minister to preside at the funeral, if he does not insult and vilify the convictions of the dead over the coffin, he is sure to take the earliest opportunity from his coward's castle—the pulpit—to declare "while in health the deceased boasted of his Infidelity and expressed contempt for the church, but as soon as sickness came and death threatened, like all Infidels, oh, how abjectly he implored the ministrations of the minister of Jesus."

Unfortunately many of the congregation are not aware that the minister is living up to the teachings of God's holy word (Rom. iii, 17), lying for the glory of God. And so many are led to believe the lie.

Henceforth all members of the Washington Secular Union can save themselvs from any likelihood of thus being insulted in their coffins. It is only necessary to write out two copies of the following instrument; be sure to sign both in the presence of three witnesses, and hav each of them sign also Place one copy in a place of safety with other papers of value and mail the other copy to the secretary of the Washington Secular Union.

FORM TO BE COPIED.

I, A..... B....., of ....., county of ....., state of Washington. by occupation ....., a member of the Washington Secular Union (organized at the city of Seattle, state of Washington, January 29, 1890), having no faith or favor for church ceremonies, prayers, invocations, and mummeries, do hereby, as my last will and most earnest last request to my heirs, administrators, executors, and assigns, especially enjoin. require. and desire that immediately after my death the president and secretary of the Washington Secular Union be notified thereof. and I hereby request and direct that the officers of the said Washington Secular Union, or the agent they shall select or appoint, shall hav sole and exclusiv charge of my obsequies.

And that no ritual, rite, or ceremony shall be permitted in connection with my funeral other than that sanctioned, requested. and approved, conducted and presided at, by the officers of the said Washington Secular Union, or the agent by them appointed for that purpose.

And that under no possible pretext or excuse shall any priest, parson, minister, or any officer or dignitary of any church be permitted or allowed to take any part in my funeral services, or to read any scripture, or read or recite from any ritual, or to make any oration, sermon, speech, or remarks, or offer any prayer, or make any invocation, or in any way or manner officiate at my funeral, or take any part in my obsequies.

And in case of there being no officer or agent of the said Washington Secular Union to preside at and conduct my obsequies, then I desire that any friend who is not an officer or activ member of any church shall read such selections from the orations for funerals prepared and issued by the said Washington Secular Union (a copy of which is hereto annexed).

But I desire and positivly insist that no Bible or text of scripture shall be read, or any prayers be uttered, or repeated, or made, or offered at, or over, my body, or in the same room in which my body may be, nor at the grave, or place of my burial or cremation.

And if this my most solemn and earnest request, my last will and wish, is not complied with, but anv religious forms, rites, prayers, or ceremonies are permitted at my obsequies, then I do hereby giv, devise, and bequeath (after the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses) one clear and full half of all my real and personal property, of every name and nature, of which I may die possessed or entitled to, to the board of directors of the Washington Secular Union—to wit, to the then acting president, secretary, treasurer, and each of the two directors at large—share and share alike—for their sole use and benefit. (I simply request them to expend the same to further the aims and objects of the Washington Secular Union.)

Realizing that in sickness, my mental faculties impaired. advantage might be taken of my infirmities, therefore in case of my making any other will or codicil, I desire and intend that the request and conditions of this instrument shall remain of full force and binding effect unless I shall in language plain and emphatic—first reciting the conditions and the date and the names of the witnesses of this instrument—unmistakably revoke and annul this document, its requests and conditions, and fully and clearly state my reasons for so doing.

In witness whereof, I hav hereunto signed and sealed this instrument, and published and declared the same as and for my last will. and most earnest and solemn wish, in the presence of three witnesses, and hav caused a duplicate hereof to be deposited with the secretary of the said Washington Secular Union, on this..... day of....., 1891, at..... (Signature).....(Seal).

At.....on this .....day of.....189 . The above named..... signed and sealed this instrument, and published and declared the same to be his last will and most earnest wish, and we in his presence, and at his request, and in the presence of each other, hav hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses.

I, ..., do design and intend this instrument to be full and complete authority for the officers of the said Washington Secular Union, or their appointed agent, to take whole, sole, and exclusiv charge of my obsequies.

And this shall be the warrant and authority of such agent to dismiss and expel from the presence of my dead body any priest, parson, minister, or church official who by request of any relativ, or other person or persons, may attempt to preside or take part, or in any way officiate, or interfere with my funeral services.

In further witness, and that there may be no possible excuse or pretext for any evasion, or failure to fully understand my wishes in this matter, I hav hereunto again signed and sealed this instrument in the presence of the same witnesses, after first carefully reading the whole instrument to them.

The penalty clause—giving half of all real and personal property to the officers of the Washington Secular Union if conditions are not complied with, is absolutely necessary in some cases to insure obedience to wishes of the dead. It is very unlikely that at such a cost even the most bigoted fanatical relativ will be willing to permit even the favorit minister to take any part in the funeral services.

I hope to speedily perfect and present for the approval of our board of directors funeral services and orations suitable to old, middle-aged, youth, and children, so that in case of impossibility of attendance of a Liberal lecturer, any person of ordinary education and ability can conduct the funeral and (first filling the blanks with facts in regard to the deceased) deliver the oration (read it, if unable to commit it to memory and recite it).

There is no money in the treasury of the Washington Secular Union that can be used to pay for the printing of such funeral service and orations.

Any person contributing $1 or more to the "funeral service fund" will be furnished with the necessary two copies of the above document, neatly and correctly type-written, all ready for signatures.

Our Coming Convention.

Co-workers Oregon State Association: The time approaches for holding our state convention for the year 1891. Are you all preparing to take an activ part in its deliberations? I sincerely hope so, for otherwise it means nothing and stands for nothing.

While it is true we can all enjoy "freedom of thought" (Shakspere says "thought is free"), and it is also true that thought must precede action, it is also as strictly true that thought which does not formulate itself into action accomplishes nothing toward bringing about that desired free speech, free press, and free society for which our regular association stands. I hav met several persons this summer in my campaign who said, "I've taken the Investigator for forty odd years," or "I've taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a great number of years," and you would naturally think considerable results ought to follow such an apprenticeship in the work of humanizing thought; but alas! in many cases the condition of inaction had become chronic, and there was no perceptible result in the neighborhood or even in the family.

We must stand together, talk with each other, move in concert, in order to accomplish results. Simply to sign the roll of names of state associations without joining activly their deliberations, neither benefits members nor the society.

It is certain that during the next year or two in this coast a necessity for vigilant and careful work will exist. An ecclesiastical propaganda in interest of more stringent sectarian legislation in coast states has already commenced. The Pacific coast secretary of the Sabbath Rest Association is here and at work

Do not be deceived, nor deceive yourselvs, by assuming that it cannot be accomplished. When eminent men, who hav been and are still powerful factors in public opinion, take position in favor of such legislation, it is bound to carry a weight of conviction.

The Hon. Geo. W. Williams said recently, speaking incidentally of the Sunday law: "Our Sunday laws are lamentably defectiv, and I would suggest that a petition be circulated and signed asking the next legislature to amend the present laws. I will prepare the necessary papers, copies of which I will furnish all who take an interest in this matter, and will circulate the papers for signatures." [Applause.]

That suggestion has been acted upon, and an activ propaganda is now going on.

It does not answer the purpose to say, "Our Constitution prohibits legislation on religious matters." What our Constitution prohibits and what our states actually accomplish is shown in the King case.

Under the rulings of United States judges, states can legislate on matters of religion. In other words, United States judges hav decided that states can do what the United States cannot do in matters of religion, and the victim of such persecutions, fined, imprisoned, and despoiled of property, has no redress in the state courts.

It behooves you, therefore, who hav undertaken to counteract the returning tide of middle-age inquisitorial infamy to keep vigilant. Watch the movement of that most merciless, most inhuman of all monopolies under which humanity has been enslaved, robbed, and tortured—religio-politico-In-God we-trust monopoly of kings, popes, priests, and preachers

Come to our state convention, and let us discuss and decide what line of action to adopt the best to counteract this spirit of fanaticism and intolerance.

Faithfully yours, MATTIE P. KREKEL,
Field Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

That Badge-Pin.

There is no doubt that a great many Freethinkers are exercised in their minds with reference to a suitable badge-pin, and that there is more interest on the subject than many suppose. Though much has been said upon it, the subject is neither settled nor exhausted. Miss Churchill's design I hav never seen. The pansy, either as a real flower or in gold and enamel, is lovely and very appropriate; only it is, as our editor says, "practically useless," because worn as an ornament by so many persons who are not Freethinkers. I had a beautiful pansy breast-pin long before any Freethought token was proposed. Perhaps, however, if Freethinkers adopted and generally wore it, other people might abandon the use of the pansy for decorativ purposes.

Otto Wettstein's badge is superb—gorgeous; but there is too much of it—too much crowding of ideas and symbols. It is a history, a lecture, and a Freethought Bible consolidated. All of the past. present, and future are packed into one square inch of surface emblazonry. My suggestion is that the passing night of superstition with its moon and stars, and the future day, emblemed by the rising sun of science, be left unrepresented; but that the flaming torch, with the word "Reason" as it now appears, be allowed to remain in its simple beauty and expressivness, as the token which will reveal to friends that we follow only where our reason leads.

Let us hav the flaming torch of reason for the Freethinker's badge-pin. It would be very significant, and could be made at small expense in either gold or silver. ELIZA B. BURNZ.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

Portugal is getting awake. The first female medical student received her diploma at Lisbon the other day.

Dr. Titus A Voelkel, former editor of Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt, is reported dangerously ill with typhoid fever.

A new Freethought periodical, El Ciclon, has seen the light of day at Alicante, Spain. We extend a hearty welcome to our contemporary, and wish it all possible success.

Damofolio, the well-known Spanish Freethinker and member of Cortes, has just issued a Catechism for Freethinkers. Our desire for our "Manual" is daily growing sharper.

The pious king Christian IX of Denmark has narrowly escaped assassination. We do not approve of killing of any kind, but the fewer people there liv of the stamp of this royal intolerant bigot the better for mankind at large.

A ghost-epidemic has started in Dortmund, Germany. Children cannot be made to remain at school for fear of ghosts. A patent remedy has been suggested by the Catholics of the town. It consists in prayers said, for hard cash of course, by the priest.

Mr. Otto Heinrichs, editor of Friedländer Boten, has been indicted by the court of Neustrelitz for writing disrespectfully of a Rev. Mr. Bossart, of Friedland, Mecklenburg. Mr. Heinrichs must be a bad man. This is the third offense against God's representativs since last October.

Zwickauer, Saxony, is a well known hot-bed for religious lunatics. A sect has started there which claims that the end of the world is near, and that consequently there is no need of working. The police thinks otherwise, and puts all the members it can catch to work breaking stone. Too bad that this does not include the ministers of other sects. It ought, for what are they but public nuisances?

On August 21 the Belgian Freethinkers unveiled at Waterloo a statue in honor of Leopold Mattot, the Freethinker whose remains were, by order of the mayor of that city, buried in the "dog's ditch." The money for the monument was raised by subscriptions from Freethinkers. Several thousand people who witnessed the ceremony were brought to Waterloo by special trains. Speeches were made by our friend Mr Leon Furnemont Mr. Navez, and others. When it comes to action the Freethinkers of Belgium stand in the foremost rank.

The annual conference of Swedish Freethinkers was held at Stockholm, August 8th. The federation consists now of sixteen auxiliary societies with a total membership of seven hundred. A motion to adopt an economic plank in the platform was voted down, and no particular line of economic reform was chosen. A general indorsement of all political reforms was passed in its place. Victor Lennstrand was renominated, as was Dr. Knut Wicksell and most of last year's members of the executiv committee. Next year's congress is to be held at Stockholm in the month of August.

There is no room for witch trials any longer, even in Austria. A few days ago a woman appeared in court and demanded the punishment of her former servant girl. She stated that the latter was a witch, who nightly came down the chimney, placed herself at the plaintiff's bed, and sucked the blood from her breast. Nothing could drive her away, she said, but the words "Jesus, Maria, Joseph!" A witness corroborated the statement, but when she offered to take the oath the judge told her to sit down, and next ordered a policeman to take the plaintiff in custody to be examined by a physician as to her sanity.

How They Made it Rain.

New York Sun's Correspondence from Midland, Texas.

Gen. Jupiter Pluvius Dyrenforth has hied him to Washington, and the rain which fell nearly every day while he was here has gone away too. He will come back to Texas in a week or ten days, however, and then the aqueous fluid will bump itself once more, the ranchmen and farmers will sing joyous peans, the John rabbits will use their ears for umbrellas, and the cowboys will strap their "slickers"—Texas for rubber coats—to their saddles when they go to the festiv roundup. Great is the name of Dyrenforth in the Llano Estacado, and when the farmers throughout this broad land realize that he can really turn on the heavenly faucet whenever and wherever he pleases they will forswear allegiance to the bewhiskered Peffer and cast a solid vote for the general. For however much correspondents who never came within twenty miles of the scene of operations—and there be such—may figurativly try to throw cold water on the government rain-making experiments, the interesting fact remains that either General Dyrenforth did literally pull cold water down upon this parched country, or else a series of the most remarkable coincidences ever known occurred here within the past three weeks. Whenever he ordered the dynamite and the rackarock powder and the explosiv balloons to be turned loose upon a clear sky there was certain to be a smart rainfall within twelve hours. This did not happen once or twice or thrice; it happened nine or ten times, and in a country, too, where showers of any kind are exceedingly rare, and where good rains are almost unknown.

When it is considered that the general had to travel an almost untrodden path, and that he had to pick and feel his way step by step, often stopping to remove obstacles which threatened to wholly bar his progress, it is remarkable that he attained the desired goal in so short a time. Badly constructed apparatus which had to be repaired many times on the field, inefficient cowboy labor, crowds of gawking, exasperating sightseers from Midland who stepped on the balloons and invariably got in the way; alkali water and burning sun, which together placed nearly every member of the expedition on the sick list at various times; a series of extraordinarily heavy gales which swept over the level prairie almost incessantly, and snapped balloon cables as though they were cotton twine—these and many other smaller matters, which at the time were equally discouraging, were daily encountered, and as often overcome.

The rain-making experiments were made solely and entirely under General Dyrenforth's direction, and his commission from the secretary of agriculture gave him permission to use his own discretion as to how they should be conducted. He was authorized to incur any expense that in his judgment was necessary, not exceeding the amount of the appropriation of $9 000; "to engage any experts, to purchase and transport any material, to pay traveling expenses of himself and his employees, as he might deem necessary in the premises for a complete trial of his experiments as well as his own compensation." General Dyrenforth charged no compensation, however, for his time and services. He gave them for the benefit of science, and, indeed, has used his own means in addition to the appropriation.

After consultation with Professor Myers, the aeronaut, as to the best form of balloon to employ, the cost, and so on, he had forty ten-foot balloons made, to contain about six hundred cubic feet of gas; twenty-eight twelve-foot balloons, to contain about one thousand cubic feet of gas, and three large balloons to be used for ascensions to make meteorological observations. He also procured several bolts of red cambric and enough sticks and twine to make and fly several hundred large kites. A great quantity—nearly a car-load—of rackarock powder, giant powder, and other powerful explosivs were procured and shipped to Midland. The object, as everyone knows who has looked into the subject at all, was to keep up a series of explosions in the air and on the ground for several hours, or even for a day, and then wait for the rain to come. The balloons were to be filled with two parts of hydrogen and one part of oxygen, and were to be exploded when high in the air by means of electrical exploders connected with wire to dynamos on the ground. Rackarock powder and dynamite were to be tied to the tails of kites and exploded in the same way, and meantime there was to be a series of big explosions, covering an area of a mile or two, on the ground. Professor Myers, who, in addition to being a balloonist, is a man of scientific attainments, was to go up in one of the large balloons, and with the aid of delicate instruments determin at what hight the current containing the greatest amount of moisture existed. The balloons were to be exploded in this current.

Such was the program laid out, and it would doubtless hav been followed to the letter if it had been physically possible to do it. But what was not taken into consideration, and what it was impossible to know anything about in advance, was the fact that day after day a most extraordinary gale would spring up and come careering over the prairie to toss the balloons about at their moorings and beat their delicate fabric against the dry, hard stubble, which does duty here as grass, or else to tear them loose and send them flying off into the air out of sight. Day after day did Professor Myers get up before dawn to the stirring reveille blown on a cornet by General Dyrenforth, hastily swallow a cup of coffee, a hot biscuit, and a bit of bacon, hie himself to his oxygen and hydrogen generating machines, and strive, with might and main, to fill the balloons with the proper proportions of the two gases. And day after day that howling wind would come up and play havoc with the balloons, or else the oxygen-making apparatus would get out of order, and many valuable hours would be consumed in repairing it.

The oxygen generator was on a larger scale than any ever made before. It consisted of a long gasoline stove, surmounted by a sheet-iron hood, in which were holes to hold the "cartridges" or tubes containing chlorate of potash and black oxide of manganese. This combination of chemicals, when exposed to a fierce heat, throws off the oxygen gas, which is purified by being passed through wash bottles containing a weak solution of lime. The lime also removes chlorine gas, which is dangerously explosiv. But the stove, although built on an admirable plan, was faulty in its construction. It would become heated to the danger point and hav to be put out and cooled. The cartridges would blow out at the ends and hav to be replaced, or something else would happen which would cause delay.

The hydrogen generators worked smoothly and quickly, and if the oxygen could hav been made fast enough, as it undoubtedly can be with better constructed apparatus in the future, all would hav been well, and the balloons could hav been exploded at intervals of twenty minutes, which it was calculated would be ample when reënforced by the ground explosion and the kites. As it was a good many balloons were sent up and exploded in spite of the difficulties, and that they did influence the atmosphere and help to cause the rainfalls is more than probable.

The kites were not very successful either. The heavy gales beating upon them were too much for the necessarily light sticks, and one after the other they rose and broke, and went diving and twisting to the ground, to the consternation of the Jack rabbits and the open-mouthed wonder of the chaparral cocks.

Another unlooked-for obstacle to the successful flying of the bright red kites was the evident antipathy to them of the Texan long-horned steers, which roam by thousands over the ranch. Mr. Draper, the electrician, had several particularly gaudy kites which got him into trouble. They were of bright red cloth, covered with shining tinfoil in stripes and crosses, and were exceedingly beautiful to look upon. They were to be flown by fine copper wires attached at the lower end to an electrometer, and were designed to ascertain the amount of static electricity in the atmosphere. One beautiful bright morning, when all the pretty creatures of the prairie—including the horned frogs, tarantulas, and rattlesnakes—were teeming with joyous life, and the birds were singing on every musketo bush, Mr. Draper sallied forth with one of his gaudy kites under one arm and his electrometer under the other. He selected an open space about two hundred yards from the house, and as he affixed his fine copper wire to his kite he looked at the mild-eyed kine which were gazing at him and contemplativly chewing their cud. Mr. Draper fastened the wire to his satisfaction, and then ran with it a little distance, while the kite rose majestically in the air like a great red flamingo. Suddenly there was a sound like unto the charging of a war-horse, and a big red bull came careering across the prairie like a horned cyclone. His head was lowered, his tail was pointed straight in the air, and his eyes flashed fire. Nothing serious resulted, but Mr. Draper invariably carried a shotgun when flying his kites thereafter, and he always selected a time of day when the cattle had gone to water.

Still, in spite of these slight difficulties, the work went merrily on, and some kites were flown tandem with dynamite attachments. The dynamite when exploded made a terrific noise in the air, which sounded much louder than when it was exploded on the ground. And noise was what was wanted.

While some of the party were working at the balloons, and some at the kites, others were scattered here and there engaged in exploding many heavy charges of rackarock powder and dynamite on the ground, and at times it sounded very like a real battle, except that there was no rattle of small arms, or shouting or shrieking or tramping of heavy bodies of men and horse. It was a battle with the horrors and the dash and the excitement left out.

And after the battle the weary workers, or fighters, would struggle back to the ranch house, and there, thanks to the hospitality of Mr. Raunells, would sleep in comfortable beds until a sharp crash overhead would giv them warning that the aerial forces, which they had been bombarding all the evening, had unlimbered their batteries and were getting them into action. Then would come flash after flash of vivid lightning which cast a white glare upon the prairies for miles around, crash after crash of thunder which made the explosions made by man seem puny and insignificant, and then the rain.

How it would pour down upon the roof and beat at the windows and drive in at the open doorways as if in a frenzy of rage to get at the creatures who had disturbed it up aloft in the beautiful sky and brought it to earth to serve their ends! No wonder that General Dyrenforth, the arch rain-maker, rose as soon as the first faint lightening in the far east showed that day was nigh and blew shrill blasts of victory upon his silver bugle! No wonder that the weary scientists, who had been ridiculed and made sport of by fun-loving paragraphers until they dreaded the sight of a newspaper, smiled at each other in a drowsy, self-satisfied way, and, to the music of the rain and the roof, turned over for another nap! They had been told by Congress to go out into the arid wilderness and make rain, and they had done it.

Mr. Powers, in his book upon this subject, gives particular prominence to the significant fact that the battle of Buena Vista, during the Mexican war, was followed by three heavy showers, although it had not rained for several months before the battle, and there was rain for several months thereafter. Many battles which were fought during the Mexican war during the dry season in that country were followed by heavy rains. In view of this fact and of the fact that in Chihuahua, Lerdo, and some other parts of Mexico no rain has fallen for a year and the people there are in great distress, it would seem that the experiments of General Dyrenforth would be watched closely by the Mexicans. That they are deeply interested in the experiments is shown by the statement made by the mayor of El Paso, when he invited General Dyrenforth to come to that town and continue his experiments, that many Mexican officials and scientific men would be present to observe them.

The experiments will certainly be continued in El Paso either by General Dyrenforth in person, or, if he is detained in Washington, by Mr. Ellis, who is fully competent to conduct them successfully. He has made an exhaustiv study of the subject and is a practical man as well as a scientific one—a somewhat rare combination.

The experiments in El Paso will be on a grander scale than any yet attempted, and several new devices for causing explosions high in the air which hav been invented by Mr. Ellis will be used. The mayor has promised every facility for the prosecution of the work, and great efforts will be made to hav the first really public demonstration of the rain-makers' power a tremendous success. Many other towns in Texas, Kansas, and the Dacotas hav invited the rain-makers to come and obscure the face of the sun for a while, but, owing to the smallness of this year's appropriations, it is doubtful if it will be possible to go elsewhere after the El Paso demonstration. Dynamite and powder and balloons and scientists are expensiv luxuries and $9,000 does not go very far in procuring them. The letters from various towns and farming communities offer all sorts of inducements for the rain-makers to come to them. One pledges the nomination for the presidency to General Dyrenforth; another promises a "barbecue dinner and a royal welcome;" a third extends assurances of "unmeasured hospitality and every facility for the work, as well as the distinguished consideration of your petitioners." Many offer to pay all expenses and a big bonus if rain is produced. There is not the slightest doubt that the farmers of Texas and other Western states are extremely interested in what is being done, and more than one Congressman will go to Washington this winter with a rain-making bill in his pocket.

We hope our new friends who hav come to us from Freethought are pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that they will like it better and better as they and it become better acquainted. Mr. Putnam's poems of travel shine as brightly in our columns as in the more familiar pages of Freethought, and correspondents on the Coast hav a little more room than they had. We expect soon to hear from George E. Macdonald, now rustling up in Washington, a spot made dangerous by militant opposition editors. He will tell us perhaps whether his loathsome contemporary has allowed him to liv. From San Francisco we also hav letters from Mr. Browne giving the news from there, and elsewhere as he hears it. Liberals visiting San Francisco should drop in at 838 Howard street and see Mr. Browne. We hope our new friends like the pictures, too, and our correspondents. Mr. Heston is a genius with the pencil, and the writers for THE TRUTH SEEKER are among the ablest in the field of Liberalism. And correspondents of Freethought are cordially invited to continue their contributions in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We shall do our best to please all our Liberal readers and displease the Christian theologians by exposing their system of supernatural chicanery.

The World's Fair.

The appearance before the World's Fair directors of the representativs of the Sabbath Union has stirred up the discussion of their object, and the result probably will be to make it easier for the other side to get a hearing. A majority of the opinions expressed, aside from the regular orthodox journals, are against the Sabbath Union. On his way from Montana to New York Colonel Ingersoll stopped in Chicago and a reporter sought his views on the subject. The colonel said:

"We want to destroy the American Sunday. It is a pest and a nuisance and it must always be so. The Fair must be kept open on Sunday. To close it would show us to be merely provincial, not cosmopolitan. It would be too countrified, you know.

"Closing the Fair Sundays would be a sort of a gum-chewing policy. You wouldn't expect anything else from a lot of gum chewing chaps, whose idea of Sunday is to sit around and get dyspepsia and wonder why God doesn't damn them. That is their idea of a sacred day.

"Why, man a sacred day is that on which somebody is made happy. If you want to make a day sacred make the people happy That can be done to a great extent by opening the great Exposition on Sunday. If they want to make Sunday a day of rest and recreation I am with them. I am against the Sunday policy which would close up tight every possible form of recreation for the people in the hope that this would drive them to church. They can't get the people there any other way."

Referring to Dr. Patton's expression, "so much the worse for the workingman" [if he could not find time to visit the Fair on a week-day], Colonel Ingersoll said:

"Yes, that's like Patton—'So much the worse for the workingman.' Patton is a malicious donkey. That's about all—Patton is a malicious donkey. He says, 'So much the worse for the workingman,' but he does not say it of himself. Patton is president of Princeton College. He has a soft job and he wants to hold on to it. Patton gets a larger salary for a small caliber than any man in this country. He and the Sunday-closing crowd are a narrow-minded, ignorant set, who never felt a throb of that feeling that makes up the brotherhood of man. The Fair will be open on Sunday."

Before the Chicago Secular Union on Sunday evening General Stiles gave the reason why the preachers want the Fair closed. "The fact of the matter is," he said, "that the World's Fair and any other place of amusement on Sunday interferes with the preacher's business, and that is his real reason for Sunday closing." After General Stiles's speech the Union adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secularists, in public meeting assembled, believing it to be to the interest of society that the World's Fair should be open on Sunday, and also believing that proper rest and recreation should be provided for employees therein; therefore recommend that the World's Fair shall be kept open on Sundays and that sufficient help shall be employed, that one-seventh of the number shall hav a holiday one day of the week, or that the hours of service be so divided between two different shifts that they be on duty say seven hours each week-day and serve each half a day on Sunday, making for each shift an average working day of eight hours."

The New York Sun, considering the matter, discloses plainly the grounds of the Sabbath Union's opposition to an open Sunday. It says:

"The question whether the World's Fair at Chicago shall be opened on Sunday is making serious trouble for the managers of the enterprise. They are asked to decide it as a question of moral and religious duty only, and not with reference to the pecuniary profits, of which the Exhibition will be in sore need.

"The prevailing sentiment of the Protestant churches, as expressed in the deliverances of their assemblies, conventions, and conferences, is undoubtedly opposed to the Sunday opening. Delegations hav been appointed to proceed to Chicago to protest against it as a violation of the commandment of God, which would outrage Christian convictions and tend to increase the popular disregard for the Lord's day. Religious papers are exhorting the managers to seek rather the approval of the almighty than the favor of men, and to show to the whole world the depth and sincerity of their own piety and the piety of this country. When the Independent sought the views of bishops and leading clergymen on the subject, the Protestants were almost unanimous in condemning the policy of Sunday opening, and some of the Roman Catholics also opposed it as a dangerous innovation. This feeling, too, seems to be growing under the stimulus of apparently concerted efforts for its cultivation, and from this time forward the managers of the Exhibition will feel its pressure steadily.

"Meantime, we do not hear of any organized movement on the other side. The only loud appeals which they hear come from those who would shut the gates on the first day of the week without regard to pecuniary loss and without reference to the public convenience. It is God's will, cry the religious enemies of opening, and God must be obeyed. The spiritual gain of obedience, they declare, will far transcend in importance any material profit which disobedience might bring in.

"The addition to their expected functions which is thus imposed upon the Fair managers is of enormous weight. Besides looking after the secular interests of the Exhibition they are required to settle a controverted question as to the proper observance of Sunday. They must mix up business and religion, theology and finance, when they are at their wits' end to provide ways and means for carrying on the enterprise. Sunday opening would increase their receipts, and yet, much as they will need the money, they are called upon to giv it up as a tribute to the religious sentiment of the Union and as exemplars of Christian conduct and champions of a theory of Sunday observance which is rejected by the great majority of the people of Christendom and of this country also. If the question as to Sunday opening of the Fair were put to popular vote, undoubtedly it would be decided in the affirmativ, in a very emphatic way. If the gates are opened on Sunday more visitors will enter than on any other day of the week. Yet the managers are urged to shut them, as a religious duty overriding every consideration of profit or public convenience. The responsibility of honoring or dishonoring the commandment of God rests on their shoulders, according to the united declarations of Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian conventions.

"The managers of the Chicago Fair are therefore in a situation full of difficulty and embarrassment. They are made the arbiters between two great parties in the religious world and between the majority of the public who want to enjoy Sunday as a day of leisure and a minority who would treat it as a fast day, on which all amusement is forbidden by divine command. When the same question came up here in the discussion as to the Sunday opening of the Metropolitan Museum of Art it was decided contrary to the views of the Sabbatarians, and probably at Chicago they will be no more successful, for in principle the two cases are precisely alike. If it is allowable to visit a picture-gallery on Sunday, it is proper to look at the collections of a World's Fair."

That puts the matter clearly—shall a few religious conventions decide an important question for the great public, and that, too, in a manner contrary to the views of that public? For the Sun is right in saying that if left to a vote of the people, the Fair would undoubtedly be kept open. The ease with which signatures to our petition against Sunday closing were obtained verifies this.

It is altogether too bad, and a reproach to the only national Freethought organization, that no consolidated opposition to the Sabbath Union has been made so that the world could hear of it. With public sentiment so largely on its side the American Secular Union is missing the opportunity of its life.

However, the matter will not be allowed to go by default. The Liberals of this country will be heard by the management of the Fair.

To Clear a Clouded Memory.

Mrs. Besant's explanation of her assertion that she had received messages similar to those which Madam Blavatsky received is that she only desired to clear Madam Blavatsky's memory of the charge of fraud, it having been said that Madam Blavatsky herself wrote the letters which she claimed she received. Mrs. Besant says she does not want to deal with the question of the authenticity of the letters. Were she to submit proofs "she would only meet the fate of Madam Blavatsky and be dubbed an impostor."

The motiv is a worthy one, becoming to the holder, but we fear the assertion will fail to receive the credence Mrs. Besant desires. As none know better than she, and as none in times past has more strenuously insisted, assertions of "supernormal" occurrences unaccompanied by proof are of absolutely no value at all. The refusal to deal with the authenticity of the letters would, in any other case, render the asserter of the marvels open to cruel suspicions. Before Mrs. Besant became a Theosophist she would not hav accepted such evidence as sufficient to hang a dog.

At the summit of Madam Blavatsky's career, when some portions of the world at least thought Theosophy worth investigating, Mr. Richard Hodgson went from England to India on behalf of the Society for Psychical Research, among whose vice-presidents were such famous Spiritualists as Professors Crookes and Wallace. He went to discover some occult phenomena, and was a very lenient judge, as he leaned toward occultism. But after three months' close investigation he was obliged to conclude that "the phenomena connected with the Theosophical Society were part of a huge fraudulent system worked by Madam Blavatsky with the assistance of the Coulombs and several other confederates, and that not a single genuin phenomenon could be found among them all."

The object of this fraudulent system may be learned from the following letter written by Madam Blavatsky to Madam Coulomb from Poona, in October, 1883:

"Now, dear, let us change the subject. Whether something succeeds or not, I must try. Jacob Sassoon, the happy proprietor of a crore of rupees, with whose family I dined last night, is anxious to become a Theosophist. He is ready to giv ten thousand rupees, to buy and repair the headquarters, he said to Colonel (Ezekiel, his cousin, arranged all this) if only he saw a little phenomenon, got the assurance that the Mahatmas could only hear what was said, or gave him some other signs of their existence (?!!). Well, this letter will reach you by the 26th (Friday); will you go up to the shrine and ask K. H. (for Christofolo) to send me a telegram that would reach me about 4 or 5 in the afternoon, same day, worded thus:

"'Your conversation with Mr. Jacob Sassoon reached Master just now. Were the latter even to satisfy him, still the doubter would hardly find the moral courage to connect himself with the society. RAMALINGA DEB.'

"If this reaches me on the 26th, even in the evening, it will still produce a tremendous impression. Address, care of N. Kandalawala, Judge, Poona. JE FERAI LE RESTE. Cela coutera quatre ou cinq roupies. Cela ne fait rien. [I will do the rest. It will cost four or five rupees. That is of no consequence.] Yours truly, (Signed) H. P. B."

It is fair to state that Madam Blavatsky denied writing this letter, but Mr. Hodgson's statements regarding it sweep away the denial, especially as a great many people in this country and elsewhere will bear witness that Madam Blavatsky never allowed a too strict regard for accuracy of statement to hinder an attainment of her object. Mr. Hodgson said:

"The envelope which Madam Coulomb shows as belonging to this letter bears the postmarks Poona, October 24th, Madras, October 26th; 2d delivery, Adyar, October 26th; (as to which Madam Blavatsky has written in the margin of my copy of Madam Coulomb's pamphlet: 'Can not the cover hav contained another letter? Funny evidence!') Madam Coulomb also shows in connection with this letter an official receipt for a telegram sent in the name of Ramalinga Deb from the St. Thomé office, at Madras, to Madam Blavatsky at Poona, on October 26th, which contained the same number of words as the above."

Mr. Hodgson also sent to the committee of the Psychical Society the letters which Madam Coulomb said were written to her by Madam Blavatsky and other letters which Madam Blavatsky acknowledged to be her own. The two parcels were submitted to an expert in handwriting and also to one of the British Museum authorities. The two came independently to the conclusion that all the letters were written by Madam Blavatsky. The committee of the Psychical Society therefore came to the conclusion:

"(1) That of the letters put forward by Madam Coulomb, all those, at least, which the Committee hav had the opportunity of themselvs examining, and of submitting to the judgment of experts, are undoubtedly written by Madam Blavatsky, and suffice to prove that she has been engaged in a long-continued combination with other persons to produce by ordinary means a series of apparent marvels for the support of the Theosophic movement.

"(2) That, in particular, the Shrine at Adyar, through which letters purporting to come from Mahatmas were received, was elaborately arranged with a view to the secret insertion of letters and other objects through a sliding panel at the back, and regularly used for this purpose by Madam Blavatsky or her agents.

"(3) That there is consequently a very strong general presumption that all the marvelous narratives put forward as evidence of the existence and occult power of the Mahatmas are to be explained as due either (a) to deliberate deception carried out by or at the instigation of Madam Blavatsky, or (b) to spontaneous illusion, or hallucination, or unconscious misrepresentation or invention on the part of the witnesses."

Of the Mahatmas, who, it was pretended, wrote these letters, Koot Hoomi was the head. Two or three years ago, when Madam Blavatsky took up her residence in London and converted Mrs. Besant, G. W. Foote, a somewhat hard-headed young man, scoffed at the madam's claims, and she honored him with a pamphlet reviling him and his notions. In reply he recalled to her memory the facts here given, and further added the details which the committee of the Psychical Society thought reflected somewhat on the truthfulness of Madam Blavatsky as to the doings of this Koot Hoomi. Mr. Foote says to Madam Blavatsky: "The great Koot Hoomi's letters hav been declared to be in your own handwriting. Further, they betray your very tricks of style. Madam Blavatsky wrote, 'Olcott says you speak very well English,' and Koot Hoomi wrote, 'one who understands tolerably well English.' Here is a small list of their similarities of spelling:

"MADAM BLAVATSKY.	KOOT HOOMI.
your's, her's	your's
expell	dispell, fulfill
thiefs	thiefs
deceaved, beseached	leasure
quarreling	quarreling
cooly (for "coolly")	alloted
lazzy, lazziness	in totto
conscienciously	circumstancial
defense	defense

"Koot Hoomi also spelt 'skepticism,' an American fashion of spelling, which you might hav acquired in the land of the stars and stripes before your voyage to India. Finally, Koot Hoomi spelt 'remarqued,' a form of spelling easily fallen into by a Russian lady with a good command of French and an imperfect command of English.

"It is also very singular, madam, that Koot Hoomi not only repeated your curiosities of spelling, and your very tricks of style, but actually repeated your crude scientific blunders; writing of 'a bacteria,' and confusing 'carbonic' with 'carbolic' acid. Still more singular is it, if possible, that Koot Hoomi's handwriting is remarkably like Madam Blavatsky's disguised, and that the experts declare his letters to be undoubtedly from your pen.

"Considering that Koot Hoomi is a wise man of the East, possessing supernormal wisdom and supernormal powers, it is astonishing that he should write to Mr. Sinnett from Thibet, in 1880, and giv as his own a long passage borrowed from a speech of Mr. H. Kiddle, an American Spiritualist, which was reported in the Banner of Light two months before the date of Koot Hoomi's letter. Koot Hoomi's explanation was shuffling and preposterous; and, subsequently, Mr. Kiddle was able to show that Koot Hoomi's amended letter still contained a number of unacknowledged borrowings, in addition to the passages now marked as quotations. Who can resist the conclusion of the Psychical Society's committee, that 'The proof of a deliberate plagiarism, aggravated by a fictitious defense, is therefore irresistible?'

"Koot Hoomi made another dreadful mistake in a letter to Mr. Hume with reference to a young man in his employment. After speaking of the young man's 'inner soul-power and moral sense,' the Mahatma continues:

"'I hav often watched that silent yet steady progress, and on that day when he was called to take note of the contents of your letter to Mr. Sinnett, concerning our humble selvs, and the conditions you imposed upon us—I hav myself learned a lesson. A soul is being breathed into him, a new Spirit let in, and with every day he is advancing towards a state of higher development. One fine morning the 'Soul' will find him; but, unlike your English mystics across the great Sea, it will be under the guidance of the true living adept, not under the spasmodic inspirations of his own untutored 'Buddhi,' known to you as the sixth principle of man.'

"Mr. Hume appends a note that at the very time this was written the good young man 'was systematically cheating and swindling me by false contracts, besides directly embezzling my money.' So much for the 'learned spirit of human dealings' of the great Mahatma, who is 'able to read the hidden thoughts of others without first mesmerising them.'

"As for Koot Hoomi's poor tricks—such as disintegrating and reintegrating letters, saucers, and cigarets—they would be looked upon with contempt by any third-rate English conjuror; while his 'astral appearance' to the faithful at Madras is declared by the Coulombs to hav been operated by means of a dummy."

Keeping these disclosures in mind, Mrs. Besant's endeavor to clear the clouded memory of Madam Blavatsky, unless accompanied by more solid proof than she is at present inclined to present, must result not in elevating the memory of the Russian adventuress but in dragging down the reputation of England's ablest living daughter. It is sad to see so hazardous a cast as Mrs. Besant has made in this.

Postal Inquisition.

"A correspondent places the address of a letter on the back thereof, the writing being across the folded parts of the envelope. He suggests this plan as an effectiv method of preventing the illicit opening of letters by steaming, etc. For the intended purpose the suggestion seems to be a good one.—Scientific American.

"A better plan is one common in Germany, which is to use two closely fitting envelopes. The smaller envelope containing the letter is covered on both sides with mucilage and while wet inclosed in the larger envelope. No steaming will ever serve to open a package thus inclosed without tearing the envelope in pieces."—The Rainbow.

In European countries where the maintenance of monarchical institutions depends upon the abject condition of the people, and a detectiv system is a necessary adjunct of government, and where there is no pretense that private correspondence is secure from the meddlesome curiosity of police spies, many ingenious methods hav been devised to thwart inquisitivness and to prevent the gaining of any knowledge through violation of the sanctity of personal letters in the mails. It is not uncommon in Germany for the writer who wishes to prevent his letter from being tampered with to not only address his letter on the back as suggested by the Scientific American, but also to put the stamps across the seam on the back. German stamps, being printed in water colors, cannot be soaked or steamed off without taking the color out of them. One way of ascertaining if a letter has been opened is to inclose in it a hair of certain color and length or other minute object agreed upon, which, escaping the notice of one not advised of its presence and on the watch for it, would be lost on opening the letter and so missing when the letter reached the person entitled to it. The ways of writing blind letters by the use of sensitiv inks, by cleverly devised ciphers, and by writing between the lines are innumerable and generally effectiv for their purpose. In Italy postal inquisition became so shameless that travelers were refused their letters on the ground that the office had not yet read them.

But it is a new thing in this country for citizens to cast about and exercise their ingenuity in devising ways to defeat the prying impertinences of post-office inquisitors. The evil is upon us, however, and it seems to be increasing. The apprehension that letters are pried into, particularly in small country offices, is very widespread, and seems justified by the general rottenness of our post-office department. In the issue of August 15th THE TRUTH SEEKER published a letter from a subscriber which began, "I am almost afraid to inclose you these $3 for fear some of Mr. Wanamaker's people will appropriate the same for their own necessities." This letter is by no means unique. The fear it expresses has become well-nigh universal.

THE TRUTH SEEKER was the first one to protest against such violations of personal rights and liberties in this country. Liberty abused is still better than the best despotism, and an inspected mail-bag is a sign of the vilest despotism. Encroachments upon the liberties of speech, of the press, and of the mails must be sturdily resisted. Without these liberties there is no liberty.

An Explanation Wanted.

Matthew (i, 18) tells us that "when Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost."

When Joseph and Mary went to the feast of the passover they missed Jesus for three days. He had run away. They finally found him disputing with the doctors. Mary reproached him, saying: "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I hav sought thee sorrowing."

Now, who knew best, Matthew or Mary, whose child Jesus was?

But if Joseph was his father, the lack of divine parentage vitiates the whole Christian scheme.

If the Holy Ghost was his father, then he was not of the house of David, which again vitiates the scheme.

The theologians will please explain.

Editorial Notes.

OUR readers will be grieved to learn of the sudden death of Charles Edwards Rousseau, the writer of the article "Homeless for a Week," which appeared in this paper. Mr. Rousseau was only twenty-six years old, and possessed exceptional ability, holding a lucrativ position of trust, and being highly regarded by his employers.

MR. T. V. MUNSON, a Freethinker of Texas, explains the sudden reduction of temperature around Denison as resulting from the experiments of the rain-makers near Midland, in that state. He says there is usually a stratum of hot air over the earth in the summer, and above it another stratum of cool air. Anything that breaks up this order, such as a sudden and powerful concussion such as produced by the ignition of explosivs at a proper elevation, will cause a downpour of the cold atmosphere, and a rapid condensation of moisture which falls in the form of rain very naturally follows. His idea is that such an explosion may possibly affect the atmosphere for a radius of hundreds of miles. It used to be thought that rain occurred when God opened the windows of heaven. If the scientific folks don't stop their discoveries and experiments some very valuable ideas of God will disappear.

THE New York Sun of the 11th instant printed this letter on its editorial page:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: In the Sun you say you hav not heard of any organized opposition to closing the World's Fair on Sunday. Such opposition, however, exists, and comes from the Freethinkers of the country. THE TRUTH SEEKER has in hand a petition against such closing with thousands of names upon it, and other liberal journals hav similar petitions. The other side to the Sabbatarianism of the Sabbath Union will be heard; the American Secular Union will utter its organized protest, and the militant colonel at the head of the Sabbath Union—who is on such flippantly familiar terms with Jesus and God—will find that there are other people in the country besides hypocrits and bigots. The World's Fair has got to be opened on Sundays.

"E. M. MACDONALD, Editor TRUTH SEEKER.

"No. 28 Lafayette place, New York, September 10th."

We hope that the Liberals all over the country will see to it that their local papers come out on the right side in this matter, or at least print letters on that side, and that such letters and all editorials favorable to Sunday opening be sent to the Secretary of the Directory of the Columbian Exposition, Chicago, Ill.

THE Prohibitionists of St. Lawrence county recently held a convention at Ogdensburg, this state, at which were passed the following resolutions: "Resolved, That the question of how to deal with the rum traffic is the problem of the age, and that its solution is the work upon the hands of the Prohibition party under God. Resolved, That the interests of our nation demand a faithful observance of the holy Sabbath and the enforcement of law touching the same, for the sake of the home and public safety." In this assumption of a divine commission to abolish the liquor traffic lurks a very grave danger, says the American Sentinel. Necessarily, when men assume to act for God, they assume also to interpret the will of God; and in this the Prohibitionists are no exception. Demanding Prohibition for religious reasons, because intemperance is sin, and because it hinders religious work, they necessarily stand committed to the suppression of everything that in their view is morally wrong—that is, everything that is in violation of the divine law; for it can not be denied that if it were the duty of the state to prohibit the liquor traffic because it is sin against God, it would be equally its duty to prohibit all sin.

Letters from Friends.

Letter from a D.D.

DETROIT, MICH., Sept. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 29th inst. is an article by C. C. Germann, "A Scheme for Consideration," which shows clearly that not all are Liberal who lay claim to that title. Giv Mr. Germann the power of the Russian czar and it is very evident that we would soon hear of his getting a corner on the brimstone business to start up a hell of his own. If he had lived in Calvin's time he could hav made himself very useful. A great pity he was born so late. He is a back number. CARL BLITZ, D.D.

P. S.—That D.D. stands for Dutch Dude.

Explanation Wanted.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav formed a circle of twelve persons among my own friends for the purpose of investigating so-called spirit phenomena. We are all skeptical and anxious to learn the truth. At our second meeting we saw a number of small, bright lights resembling, as nearly as I can describe them, little stars. As the room was in total darkness at the time, we cannot account for them. At each meeting since we hav seen similar ones. And if any of your readers can enlighten us as to how it can be explained by science, they will confer a favor on Yours for truth,

GEO. L. ANDRUS.

A Liberator of Minds.

MAYBERT, Aug. 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $7 for two subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER and two picture books of Bible Pictures when published. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since about two weeks after D. M. Bennett's death, and hav got a number of subscribers, and hav had three "Pictorial Text-Books," which shows that I like THE TRUTH SEEKER and pictures. I am a great admirer of John Peck, Heston, and Ingersoll. My favorit pictures in the "Pictorial Text-Book" are "The Contrast" and "The Creedal Fiddle." I can get three subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER among the Spiritualists to one of any other class. E. E. MATTESON.

A Friend of the Deserving.

SALEM, Sept. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I read the letter in which James Yates, from poverty, resigns THE TRUTH SEEKER, in the issue of Aug 29, 1891, and it struck a soft spot in my humanity. Salem and Washingtonville are but five miles apart, and yet Mr. Yates is an entire stranger to me. But I happened to meet a brother miner of his the other day in Salem, and I made inquiry of this man as to Mr. Yates's good character, which proved satisfactory to me. Mr. Yates says he is sixty-five years of age, and I am in my seventy-fifth year. So there is no knowing which one of us will be laid away in mother earth first. It is very uncertain, for I had a loud call last winter for that place, but I am better now. Well, to settle "what is to be done with the above case," and to help Mr. Yates and THE TRUTH SEEKER a little. Please find inclosed $3 25—one year's subscription for Mr. Yates and 25 cents for Ingersoll on Shakspere. Now, if Mr. Yates and I liv till Sept. 8, 1892, and hav moderate good health, his case will be remembered. Respectfully yours,

SIMON SHARP.

Demands Natural Opportunities.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: If Mr. Darrow will read "Progress and Poverty" he will find that he is much mistaken on "The Single Tax Question." In the first place, single taxers do not want land, but the rental value of land for public uses. And if he will think over this matter for a few moments he will see that this must relieve the farmer, as his taxes are levied mainly on improvements. The single tax would relieve him of assessments on these improvements, and make him pay no more than the speculator who held a similar piece of land idle. He will also find out that natural opportunities do not include "houses already built and furnished by other people," but mean the land, the air, the mines, the sunshine, or, in plain English, mean certain locations made valuable by the presence of nature's forces or the people. He will also learn that his silly objections hav been answered thousands of times in single-tax papers, and are to most of us as big a "chestnut" as the Lord's Prayer.

Very respectfully, an admirer and reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, DANIEL CAVANAGH.

Considerations on Freethought Publishing.

MONUMENT, ORE., Aug. 20, 291 E.S.

MR. EDITOR: You need one million dollars more in your business to secure for the people the news of the world by telegraph. You appear to me obedient to our country's laws, advocating and agitating repeal of all laws and customs that bar the road to human progress and happiness. Keep on in this path. It is a winning card. And you can do no more good for the people while free than you could within the prison walls crying for liberty. The people are neither worth nor benefited by human sacrifice, but they need and are entitled to education and knowledge that help them to help themselvs.

Now, my friend, remember that the people are like the reporters, they want to know everything. I pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Investigator, and two state papers. One paper of the price of all would be cheaper, with less correspondence and less annoyance at having to read and pay twice over for Freethought correspondence in both papers alike, which would not occur in a well-regulated business partnership. Let the Freethought publishers unite and start a paper teeming with science, philosophy, and true Americanism, and the telegraphic dispatches, with correspondence like our Freethought writers, without any silly trash called story, that the leading papers fool the people with. Such stuff prevents their progressing. HENRY BURSTOW.

A Spiritualistic Investigation Proposed.

Sun's Day, Aug. 23, 291.

DEAR FRIENDS: Do you not want some good Liberal or physiological work? I want to sell a few books. I think of going to New York and Brooklyn in September, and want to visit some mediums there and hope "you uns" will feel enough interest in my reports thereof to induce you to help me to do so by ordering a book or two—any that you see advertised in our papers, or any other good book you may want. Although I liv in the big city of Pokeepsie I find no medium here and no prominent believer in the ism. But my brother-in-law, Mr. Phillips, with whom I am staying, is a strong Spiritualist and assures me there are a great many believers here, but the unpopularity of the belief causes them to keep quiet.

By the way, will some one tell me if Emma Abbott can lift a cow, a horse, or an elephant with the same ease she can human flesh?

Fishkill-on-Hudson, N. Y., will be my address for six weeks yet, but Snowville, Va., will always reach me.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Death and Life.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Following is a letter written to a friend whose only son, a young man of seventeen, was drowned. As Mr. Longford, Dr. Rhodes, and many other friends, hav asked me for a copy of the letter, I send it to you for publication. DR. COCHRAN.

My Dear Sir: What a silence, what a mystery, shrouds your home. In the sea of death the ship of reason is stranded, but faith sails on. To fathom the mystery of death, which is only another name for life, would be to fathom eternity. Who has traced the boundaries of the shores of death?

If death is an eternal sleep, it will be a long one. No God to haunt us, no ghosts to play upon our imaginations.

Remember this always, nothing can ever die. Your dear son is not in the grave, but somewhere near you In what form I do not know, but he is not in the Christian heaven, nor in the arms of their God. He has gone out into the fields of Mother Nature, where it is to be hoped the Gods hav no resting-place.

I know of nothing so destructiv to human happiness as a he-God.

What a dungeon is the chamber of death! It is so pitiless. It puts a problem before us that has never been solved. It stabs the innocent heart, and burns as straw all the dear uniting strands which the earth-life has woven between us and our lost.

Why this cruelty? Why does this mystery place its icy hand upon our aching hearts, already so nearly paralyzed with the coldness of fear and doubt?

Were it not for faith and hope, we who hav lost an angelic friend would go mad. On the pillars of faith and hope rests the bridge that spans the dark gulf which separates the past and the future eternities. Or, I should say, which seems to separate, for ignorance alone makes all divisions and separations in nature, and has invented all the Gods and all the devils. But away above all this livs our blessed Mother Nature; into her arms we can trustingly fall. Knowing that she has carried us safely through the eternities of the past, can we not trust her to take us through the eternities of the future? Your brother in Nature, DR. COCHRAN.

Wanted, Crescent City Liberals.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Aug. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am a stranger in New Orleans, and regret to find no evidence of the existence of a branch of the American Secular Union or any Freethought center in that city. It must be a profitable field for Freethought labor, as the Moody and Sankey minstrel troupe, after a long struggle with the legions of the devil, departed in sorrow, having made no converts, and left the field to the enemy. The Rev. (?) Sam Jones, of Texas, after a determined siege, packed his grip and left for parts unknown, observing that New Orleans was "the toughest place he had struck yet." If Christian humbug and Christian blackguardism fail to produce any effect, would it not seem that New Orleans contains good soil in which the seeds of Freethought could germinate? The Roman Catholic church is very strong here, but there are a very large number of people who are indifferent to all forms of creed, and who only need some encouragement to become good Liberal thinkers. If we could get one of the lecturers of the American Secular Union down here, I think he would do good work, and if a branch of the Union could be formed it would be a most useful headquarters for the exchange of ideas among the activ workers for the cause. I am anxious to become a member if such a branch can be formed, and should this letter fall under the notice of any New Orleans Liberals, I trust they will reply in this column (with your permission) and that erelong the banner of Liberal thought will be floating in this city with a strong band of defenders around it.

If I may be permitted a suggestion, I think it would be a good idea if you published in every number of THE TRUTH SEEKER some of the rules of the Union with regard to application for membership, fees, etc., as I know several people who are, I feel sure, only deterred from joining it by their ignorance on these points, and I expect it is the same all over the country.

With the best wishes for yourself, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the truth, believe me,

Yours in the cause, ROBT. FLEMING JONES.

Is Going to Make a Ladder and Practice Climbing.

PLAINVILLE, GA., Aug. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Send me one of the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANACS. I am a poor man—a mechanic by trade, and my customers work me very hard, but all my spare moments I giv to Freethought communications. Often, when I am at my work-bench, my Christian friends get talking about their Christ, and all about the Holy Ghost, and all about their preachers, and they tell what they know about God; what he did to save the world from sin. If I could believe all I hear about the way to get up there, I would make myself a ladder and practice climbing before I get too old. But as I hear of so many ways, I intend to wait awhile—as I don't like to climb—and see if their Christ won't raise me up at the last day with them. A friend told me the other day that the devil was sure to get me. I asked him how he knew, and he said God said so. I asked him if God told him so. "Yes," was his answer. So, as I had found the man that I had longed to see, I quit my work for a few minutes to talk with him, as I wished to compare myself with him. I asked him many more questions in regard to his past ups and downs, and concerning his foreknowledge, and so on. At last he said I was as good as he was as far as man's principles are concerned. But he said he had been born of water and the Holy Ghost, and he would be saved and I would be lost. He said the cross was heavy. The burden was so heavy, at times, he could hardly pick it up. I told him that I understood God to tell me that his yoke was easy and his burden was light.

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can truthfully say that I indorse the Nine Demands. I am talking to the Christian brothers about them. Almost everyone tells me that six or seven of them will do, but the rest of them they cannot support, for the Christian institutions are ordained of God and cannot be broken.

Please tell the brother Editors of many other Freethought papers that I giv them many thanks for the sample copies of their papers and tracts, which I hand around wherever I think they will leave their print. I wish I could help you all. A. J. ABLES.

This Would Make the Bible a Nice "Little" Book.

ST. ELMO, TENN., Sept. 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose a copy of a letter on what I consider a pressing and momentous question. How long before we will lose the last vestige of freedom? This man Tyner has proved himself to be a bigoted partisan without the first quality of an impartial jurist. It is high time that he should step down and giv place to some other man that has some remote conception of what constitutes decency. Those obnoxious post-office laws ought to be repealed, especially the obscenity and lottery clauses. I never bought a lottery ticket and probably never will. But if I choose to it is nobody's business but my own. Pretty soon business men will not be allowed to order whisky by mail.

L. L. GOODWIN.

ST. ELMO, TENN., May 16, 1891.

JAMES N. TYNER, Asst. Att'y-general, Washington, D.C.,

Dear Sir: I hav just read your decision in the case of B. C. Murray concerning the mailing of the Bible; and to say that I am surprised beyond measure is putting it very tamely. You decide that there is nothing indecent in the Bible.

Nothing indecent in a book giving full and explicit directions to a young man how he can commit a rape on a young lady, and that young lady his own sister!

Nothing indecent in a book giving young ladies full and explicit directions how to commit incest with their own father, and in consequence be blessed above their companions!

Nothing indecent in a book that tells of a man who put away his wife because she was a decent woman, and then committed lewdness with more than a thousand of the most beautiful young ladies in the country, to see which would afford him the greatest amount of sexual pleasure!

Nothing indecent in a book that recommends the stripping naked of a beautiful young lady and placing her on the body of a dying old man, to giv the old man a revival of warmth!

In the name of all the gods, if these things are not indecent, vulgar, and obscene, pray tell us what is.

If a book containing those vile things and a thousand more as dirty, nasty, and filthy is not to be denied carriage by mail, what in the name of sense and reason can exclude any others?

In the case of the fishery dispute between England and the United States, suppose President Harrison was to cross the ocean and gain personal audience with Queen Victoria, and use the language to her that David used in his confab with Abigail (see 1 Sam. xxv, 22), would anybody consider that "decent?"

If the churches will flay the Bible of its filth—eviscerate it of its nastiness—and castrate it of its barbarous brutality, it will be quite a nice little book. But until that is done, the fewer other books are excluded from the mails the better.

Yours for purity and decency, L. L. GOODWIN.

Lying Spirits.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Aug. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In reading this week's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER I was struck with the article, "Lying Spirits and Spiritualism."

Now, even supposing there to be anything in the spirit business, those who knew the late Charles Bradlaugh best in his lifetime will know that the man who in 1881 was thrust out of the English House of Commons with disheveled hair and torn coat, who suffered all the ignominies that Christian England dared insult him with, and yet through it all stuck fast to his convictions, would not be the man in spirit-land to recant "his life-long utterances." But I should like to know through your valuable paper why Freethinkers should or could be believers in Spiritualism. I hav been for years a Freethinker from conviction. When I threw up the religion that had been crammed down my throat when a boy, I threw up superstition in every form, and to-day, after suffering more than once for my opinions, I do not see how I could be a Spiritualist any more than I could be a Christian. Spiritualism is just one of the coats that the Christian wolf can wear at leisure. If we as Freethinkers are to attack the priest's stronghold, superstition, let us show the world we hav something better to giv (and surely belief in Spiritualism is not better). Let us show our fellow-workmen we are above doing a mean action. Let us possess some of the spirit of the late C. Bradlaugh. We hav some great, good men who hav gone and left their "mantle" behind—C. Bradlaugh, Thos. Paine, Gambetta, Shelley, Volney, Voltaire (and our own Ingersoll, who is with us yet). Spiritualism never troubled them. They left that sort of trash to the people who hav the audacity to tell you that the Bible is true, that it is the work of a just and benevolent God. I say these are the lying spirits. Let any Freethinker who has the least touch of Spiritualism on his brain put a cold wet cloth round his forehead and study Paine's "Age of Reason." I dare take that for my Bible on my death-bed. I know that were I to prevent anyone the right of enjoying their own opinion I should be making a slave of myself. But how can we combat superstition and hug it to our hearts at the same time? I might as well go to a priest or parson and say, "The religion you preach is all rot, but I believe it all the same." Rather let us mix with Christians with the "Age of Reason" in one hand and the Bible in the other and tell them we hav emerged from the darkness of the latter into the marvelous light of the former. Do not let us be bigoted in our belief but in a gentle yet firm manner point out the impossibility of a virgin conceiving, of a just and merciful God being the author of rapin, murder, and robbery; that the authors of the trash were lying spirits; that the people who preach it to-day do it for the almighty dollar, and that three parts of the people who hear these lying spirits would not believe them only they get so many threatenings of the brimstone business that they get scared. I am not a Freethinker because some one else was. I am a Freethinker because I can not help it and not be a hypocrit. I am honest in my convictions, and if I am to get damned for it I shall still hav the pleasure of knowing that I was sincere, that I obeyed the dictates of my conscience. Brothers and sisters, let there be no lying spirits amongst us. Let us be earnest. Let us all be Bradlaughs.

Yours for freedom from bogieism, GEORGE HENRY.

Heaven Authoritativly Described.

ROCKFORD, WASH., Aug. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for your grand paper. I cannot do without it so long as I hav a cent to send. In this place we hav two churches and a baseball club, and the boys used to play on Sunday, but some time ago it came to a collision with one of the church-members and baseball boys, and it also came to a suit between the parties. The boys would not quit playing ball on Sunday and the orthodox Christians would stop them for the sake of God. The case turned out in favor of the boys, and this Christian had to pay for his work for God $108 25. Here is a good instance of what religion can bring a man to. It would hav been a good deal better policy to use $108 25 in something useful on earth, than to spend it on God for God's sake. If God will do justice he has an opportunity now, in paying the cost of the case, but as he has not done so yet, I am in doubt he will do it. Perhaps he will, in the next world—I cannot say.

I hav a clip from the Minneapolis Evening Tribune, where Rev. Edward Mitchell, of St. Paul, speaks about heaven. He says nothing about Infidels, but as I think Infidels like to know how good Christians hav it there, I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will print it.

I wish that all good, thinking men and women will stand up for the right and truth when it is trampled on. We hav nothing else to liv for. All our life in hypocrisy is a failure. Yours for mental liberty, MARTIN GRAU.

The Rev. Edward C. Mitchell, of St. Paul, yesterday preached on "What Angels Do in Heaven." "Heaven," he said, "must be full of activity, but it must be activity which accomplishes something useful to men. In the first place, men in heaven (angels) must be associated in an orderly way; they are not a promiscuous crowd. And there will be occupation for many wise angels in classifying and arranging those who come into the heavens. In heaven, as everywhere else where a number of men come together, some must be leaders or rulers; some must hav official position in the various grades and degrees of heavenly life. Many must be engaged in teaching those who are less wise. There will be many books and writings which will engage the attention of the angels. Many cases are given in the scriptures in which books were seen in the spiritual world," etc., etc.

Where the Rev. Mr. Mitchell gets his information we will not inquire. He, no doubt, knows just as much about heaven as any of the other preachers and teachers. If his view is correct it settles the oft-mooted question as to whether newspaper men will go to heaven. If they hav books in heaven, they must also hav newspapers, and to get out such newspapers as will be needed by the higher intelligence prevailing there they must hav the best trained journalists. The newspaper scoop will also be a feature of heaven, as it is to be a place of intense activity, and that being the case the Evening Tribune will of course be "in it." It will make a practice of scooping all its contemporaries there as here. Mr. Mitchell also provides a place and occupation for the preachers and teachers; but he leaves it somewhat in doubt as to whether there will be anything for the lawyers to do. It is possible that some of the best of them will be admitted, but it looks as if their occupation will be gone, as everybody will be too good-natured to indulge in lawsuits. Perhaps something else will be found for them to do. But we may rest quite certain that there will be no place and no occupation for the Minnesota legislature, because the preacher tells us that the activity there must be a species of activity 'which accomplishes something useful to men," and it is perfectly patent that the legislature has not and will not accomplish anything either useful to men or angels. He also tells us that "as angels are men with spiritual bodies they will need all the employment and activities which men on earth need except those which relate to merely physical things." All the doings of the Minnesota legislature so far are purely of the earth earthy. Their aims and the subjects of their debates and legislation are purely physical. From Ignatius Donnelly, who spends most of his time in looking for $10 a day clerkships for his sons, down to the most wild-eyed granger who eagerly pockets his free railroad pass, their whole study is how to reap some material advantage

Mr. Mitchell's sermon will do much good, for we can now see how much more inducement there is to go to heaven than we formerly imagined.

News from a Co-operativ Colony.

LA LOGIA SINALOA, MEX., Aug. 2, P. M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: Since the publication of my last letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 4th, over a score of your readers hav written asking various questions which I will try and answer with your permission.

But first I wish to say, I believe J. Christ is on earth for a fact and he is down here in Mexico. At any rate, I saw a fellow on an ass with a scourge made of small cords. He wore a seamless jacket, and parted his hair in the middle like a fool. He had a flock of sheep and goats, but had not got them divided when I saw him.

Fifty odd people hav come here and joined us since I last wrote. Two, at least, went away badly dissatisfied. They came here about two months ago and cursed and damned everything here, except the mescal; that they pronounced far better than whisky. There are twenty men in our mess and one is a Nimrod, who beforetime was known as James Tanon. His brother I call Ramrod. They are both mighty hunters. Venison, wild hog, and other game hav been brought in by them for our table many times. A turtle was brought in not long ago. It was caught at the bay. It supplied the camp, which is over two hundred. The river was very low up to six weeks ago, from one to two feet deep and fifty feet wide. This was said to be the lowest it was ever seen, except once a long time ago. Our whole dependence is on this river and on this ditch. When I saw the river run so low I began to lose hope, but in a few days and without a drop of rain here where we are the river rose seven or eight feet and stands at that now, so I hav no fear about the matter. To the various ones asking where they can get the best information concerning this place I will say, get "Integral Coöperation No. 2: Homes and How to Obtain Them;" these can be had by sending to the Credit Foncier Company, 32 Nassau street, New York. We hav a paper printed here at $1. Three parties will leave Enterprise, Kan., this fall for this place, and parties intending coming here should write to that office. Work on the railroad has begun, and whether the people here ever succeed or not they will beat the world for starting big jobs with little means. This road will be twelve hundred miles long when completed. They are talking of laying thirty miles of track soon. Albert K Owen is here. We all went out to the corral and sat down on the feed-boxes while he talked to us. The ladies were seated on chairs and benches. Mr. Owen, dressed in hip pants and shirt with the sleeve up to the elbows, talked for a while, and then invited anyone that chose to ask any question they liked. He answered their questions with satisfaction to nearly all. School is going on here for the benefit of the children living at the ditch camp. On the 3d of June it was my luck to fall backward head-foremost down a well thirty-five feet. I do not remember falling or being taken out, but I do remember being well cared for when I got my senses. I am as well as ever to-day. The whole camp came to see me as I lay stretched on my back, but no one mentioned Jesus or God to me. In fact, I believe most of the people here hav forgotten there ever was such a fellow. I think about four months more will see the ditch completed. Last Sunday while lying on a mat in my house studying Spanish I felt something move under me and on looking I found a six-foot rattlesnake which I killed. We killed two lizards between three and four feet long, and while I write I can count a dozen smaller ones looking down from my ridge-pole. I call them small—they are about a foot long. They are not poisonous. I hav never heard of anybody dying from the bite or sting of anything here. There are no flies or musketoes or other insects. How it will be later on I cannot say. We hav just had two showers and it is my opinion that plenty of rain would make plenty of insects. I read an article in one of the Northern papers about the starving colonists. I want to say it is a lie. There is no one starving or hungry here. While I believe in integral coöperation I would not write lies to entice people here. I positivly know of some who hav been refused to come here because they were believed to be immoral, and I believe that if any Freethinker thinks of coming here he had better make up his mind to liv a correct life as near as he can. A. BUTTERFIELD.

An All-Round Lashing of the Divine Donkeys.

BRADFORD, PA., Sept. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Our village has for a period of fifteen years enjoyed to the full the benefits of our most holy religion. It is situated in one of the most prosperous oil-fields in this part of the state; of course the people residing here as a general thing hav accumulated some small fortunes, and as is the case in most villages of its kind its citizens hav been very liberal in contributing toward churches. Of late there seems to be a kind of a heresy springing up amongst certain of the people, and the ministers are coming to understand, from a falling off of their patronage on Sunday, that some evil influence is spreading over their congregations, and are taking measures to tell us through the columns of one of our daily papers. This is brought about by business falling off in the production of oil. The producers as a consequence are running short of money. The laborer is, as another consequence, allowing the contribution-box to pass without dropping anything into it, digressing a little from the usual course on Sunday. This won't do; it won't meet the hearty approbation of the ministers. If the congregation want their weary souls prayed for they must of necessity come down with cash. The ministers must be paid for their Sunday work. "Keep holy the Sabbath day." They cannot stand up in the pulpit and exhort and supplicate and piously petition God to "temper the wind to the shorn lamb" if they do not receive some encouragement. It is impossible to expect them to stand in those poorly ventilated churches suffocating, and at the same time telling their listeners that the World's Fair must be closed on Sunday, and that it is a horrible sin for scientific men to force rain out of the grasp of God in Texas and restore to the ranchmen the products of their labor, and ridiculing our councilmen for not passing laws closing business places on Sunday—it is impossible to expect them to do this without pay. In short, they must be remunerated or good efforts cannot be made in the direction of saving souls, to the extent of preaching two sermons every Sunday. "Keep holy the Sabbath day." This Sunday work must be put down, and if it is put down your congregations must pay for it, or our holy institution must inevitably pass away into oblivion. I notice that the business men of this village, the very men on whom the prosperity of the village is dependent, do not interfere in the affairs of the church and ask them to stop their preaching and working on Sunday, but mind their own affairs, and are still giving to the ministers the same opportunity they ask for themselvs.

I often wondered if that bigoted spirit would ever soften itself toward honest men and the pioneers of all good movements for the benefit of the human race. I notice the same spirit of persecution still lingers in the bosom of the church that burnt Bruno at the stake in Rome, for simply believing in eternal extinction after death. That called Columbus a fool for thinking that if he had a small fleet and sailed toward the setting sun he would discover another world. That burnt Servetus at the stake in Geneva for believing in religious toleration and the innocence of honest error. That put that great and glorious gentleman Galileo in the Inquisition for teaching that the earth was round or nearly so, that it revolved on its axis once in twenty-four hours and that it swung completely around the sun once in three hundred and sixty-five days. For entertaining these now undisputed facts he was made by the Inquisitors to place his hands on the Bible and say he was wrong. But in the presence of the torturing irons he said, "It is nevertheless true." How noble! The church was perhaps right in its time. But that time was far removed from the present. In the dim long ago, when she was assisted by miracles, the Holy Ghost, and Professor Christ, she made some small impression on ignorant and weak humanity. Let me tell the church that since man by his own careful study of the sciences educated himself and inaugurated a system for the following generations, it is not to his interest to support churches and keep ministers in idleness. And also let me tell her, as soon as man loses his superstition and ceases to contribute to the support of these idle vagabonds she will become obsolete and pass into that sepulcher called the past along with the balance of her rubbish and mythological absurdities. It is only a beggarly institution and livs on what it can crave from the poor underpaid millions in all countries. I am amazed to think that she is not holding her own when I consider her experience of eighteen hundred years, and added to this the superintendence of God and his first assistant the Holy Ghost, and also that the merciful Christ has been feeding the followers of his lamb on his own body and blood—very nutritious food and invigorating drink this. But alas, we must lose our superstition after all our efforts to nourish and foster this huge monster whose now moldy walls were once erected on blood.

An incident occurred to me the other day that I must tell. It gave some good chances to giv one of the churches a few words of advice. We stopped at Ridgway, a small station on the line of the Baltimore, Reading & Pennsylvania railroad, for orders. When I alighted on the platform from out of the engin cab a young gentleman accosted me and handed me a book in a very polite manner. I perceived as soon as I had the book in my hand his intention. I opened it. I read, "Miss ——, collecting for a gold watch for the benefit of the Catholic church." "My good friend," said I, "I am powerless to giv you any aid." Said he, "Oh, I've got all of the other gentlemen's names for a dollar and would like to hav yours for some small amount. Anything you can giv will be appreciated, I assure you, very much." I did not hav much time to tarry, so said I: "I think, young man, you are looking for aid from the wrong source. Do you church people still contend that your God made the world in six days out of nothing?" To which he answered that they do. "Then," said I, "you should ask your God to make you a church out of the same material, and if he is interested in your good Christian work and wants your worship I am of the opinion that he will accede to your demands." This put him in a fit of Christian hatred, and I bid him good-day, got my orders, and passed on.

This church business is getting monotonous. The time-worn and priestly chants are not in keeping with the age. What the heart and brain of the nineteenth century demand is something more elevating—a system of humanity, giving to man, woman, and child equal privileges in reading, thinking, writing, and worshiping or not worshiping as they see fit. I hav more confidence in the philosophy of the present than in the mythology of the past, more reliance on Humboldt than on Moses, and I take for my standard of literature, Shakspere. This arsenal of thought, this variety of intellectual ideas, is good enough Bible for me. Looking down through the long vistas of the past upon the maimed and wounded, the deaf and dumb, the fool and cripple, I am shocked to think it is the work of any God. How could the devil do worse? For this God of misery creating cruelty I hav only hatred and contempt. I neither ask his heaven nor fear his hell. I hate, abhor, loathe, and execrate him, and when I worship it will be the comforts of this life.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"The Quiet Home."

O mothers, worn and weary,
With cares which never cease,
With never time for pleasure,
With days that hav no peace,
With little hands to hinder,
With feeble steps to guard,
With tasks that lie unfinished,
Deem not your lot too hard.

I know a house where childish things
Are hidden out of sight—
Where never sound of little feet
Is heard from morn till night—
No tiny hands that fast undo,
That pull things all awry—
N baby hurts to pity
As the quiet days go by.

The house is all in order,
And free from tiresome noise—
No moments of confusion—
Scattered, broken toys;
And the children's little garments
Are never soiled or torn,
But are laid away forever
Just as they last were worn.

And she, the sad-eyed mother,
What would she giv to-day
To feel your cares and burdens,
To walk your weary way!
Ah! happiest on all this earth
Could she again but see
The rooms all strewn with playthings
And the children round her knee!

What We Teach.

A correspondent wishes to know what we teach in the Corner. We try to teach only that we know in this bright world which we inhabit, and to discover all that is possible, all that we think will serve in building up a nation and enabling all to liv nobler and better lives. We teach the principles of good citizenship, a high and pure morality, how to liv well and truly. We contend that right living here will fit us for any other condition hereafter, should we find ourselvs in conscious existence after we hav shuffled off this mortal coil. We hav no actual knowledge regarding a future state of existence, although many believe there is one. If there is, we shall, no doubt, be fitted for it when it is reached. Heaven and hell, to us, mean conditions, not localities. We hav an excellent heaven right here in this world, or its opposit. In regard to God as a supreme creator, we know nothing. If there is a God and he made something out of nothing, he is certainly a marvelous being and quite beyond the comprehension of mortals.

Our business is to deal justly and honestly, to treat human beings as we would wish to be treated ourselvs under all circumstances, to yield to others the same rights we exact from them, to exercise reason and judgment in all matters, to believe on evidence, to do all the good we can and as little harm as possible.

Who does the best his circumstance allows,
Does well; acts nobly, and such is entitled to the consideration and respect of his fellows. S. H. W.

Biographical Sketches.

IV.—MILTON.

John Milton, poet, philosopher, and dramatist, was born Dec. 9, 1608. His father was of an ancient Catholic family, but was disinherited on becoming a Protestant. But by energy and perseverance he accumulated quite a little fortune. Unlike Shakspere, Milton had educational advantages and graduated from college. Of his childhood not much can be said. He never had any adventures and never "sowed his wild oats," but sat apart from everyone and studied. His John the Baptist, in that beautiful poem, "Paradise Regained," personifies Milton. He says:

When I was yet a child no childish play
To me was pleasing. All my life was spent
Serious to learn and know, and thence to do
What might be public good; myself I thought
Born to that end, born to promote all truth,
All righteous things.

And all through his life he was the same, calm, decisiv, and dispassionate. He has broken the record of the poet's usual disposition. I know of no one like him unless it is Ben Jonson. In the year 1643 he married a pretty, frivolous little butterfly, Mary Powell. The poor little lady evidently found it dull living with a man so entirely bound up in himself, and after the rather severe honeymoon was over she went away on a visit promising to come home on a certain holiday. And when the holiday came Mrs. Milton refused to come back. Stern and proud as he was, Milton repudiated her at once, and made the world richer by his "Treatis on Divorce," written in the moment of inspiration probably. Suffice it to say, a great deal of Liberalism was introduced into it. Afterward they became reconciled and lived together in apparent happiness until she died. Her death occurred in 1652-3, leaving him three daughters—Anne, Mary, and Deborah. But his children never had any affection for their stern papa. Maybe they inherited their mother's lively disposition. I will quote what Taine says of it:

He had taken his daughters for secretaries, and made them read languages which they did not understand, a repelling task of which they bitterly complained. In return he accused them of being undutiful and unkind. . . . Mary, the second, hearing one day that he was about to be married, said that his marriage was no news; the best news would be his death.

Poor girl! she probably meant everything that she said—at that moment. When a person is forced into the companionship of a sour, morose, and disagreeable person, they are apt to say hard things. His second marriage occurred Nov. 12, 1656. His second wife died shortly afterward. Then Milton took another mate, and this was No. 3. His unceasing study told against him and he became totally blind. It was then that his daughters at his dictation wrote "Paradise Lost." I will draw my sketch to a close with a pretty quotation from that popular poem:

The sun, now fallen, ...
Arraying with reflected purple and gold
The clouds that on his western throne attend:
Now came still evening on, and twilight gray
Had in her sober livery all things clad;
Silence accompanied, for beast and bird,
They to their grassy couch, these to their nests
Were slunk, all but the wakeful nightingale.
She all night long her amorous descant sung.
Silence was pleased: now glowed the firmament
With living sapphires: Hesperus, that led
The starry host, rose brightest, till the moon,
Rising in clouded majesty, at length,
Apparent queen, unveiled her peerless light,
And o'er the dark her silver mantle threw.

This great thinker and beautiful poet closed his eyes in eternal sleep Sunday, Nov. 8, 1674.

IDA A. BALLOU.

A Wise Old Raven.

High over the breaking waters flew a wise old raven.

He was bound many miles westward, right out to the sea-coast, to unearth a sow's ear which he had buried in the good times.

It was now late autumn and food was scarce. When you see one raven, says Father Brohm, you need only look round to discover a second.

But you might hav looked long enough when this wise old raven came flying; he was, and remained, alone. And without troubling about anything or uttering a sound he sped on his strong coal-black wings through the dense rain-mist, steering due west.

But as he flew, evenly and meditativly, his sharp eyes searched the landscape beneath and the old bird was full of chagrin.

Year by year the little green and yellow patches down there increased in number and size; road after road was cut out of the heathery waste, little houses sprang up with red-tiled roofs and low chimneys, breathing oily peat-reek. Men and their meddling everywhere!

He remembered how, in the days of his youth—several winters ago, of course—this was the very place for a wide awake raven with a family—long, interminable stretches of heather, swarms of leverets and little birds, eider ducks on the shore with delicious big eggs, and tid-bits of all sorts abundant as heart could desire.

Now he saw house upon house, patches of yellow corn land and green meadows; and food was so scarce that a gentlemanly old raven had to fly miles and miles for a paltry sow's ear.

Oh, those men! those men! The old bird knew them.

He had grown up among men, and what was more, among the aristocracy. He had passed his childhood and youth in this great house close to the town.

But now, whenever he passed over the house he soared high into the air, so as not to be recognized. For when he saw a female figure down in the garden he thought it was the young lady of the house, wearing powdered hair and white head-dress, whereas in reality it was her daughter, with snow-white curls and a widow's cap.

Had he enjoyed his life among the aristocracy? Oh, that's as you please to look at it. There was plenty to eat and plenty to learn; but, after all, it was captivity. During the first years his left wing was clipped, and afterward, as his old master used to say, he was upon parole d'honneur.

This parole he had broken one spring when a glossy black young she raven happened to fly over the garden.

Some time afterward—a few winters had slipped away—he came back to the house. But some strange boys threw stones at him—the old master and the young lady were not home.

"No doubt they are in town," thought the old raven; and he came again some time later. But he met with just the same reception.

Then the gentlemanly old bird—for in the mean time he had grown old—felt hurt, and now he flew high over the house. He would hav nothing more to do with men, and the old master and the young lady might look for him as long as they pleased. That they did so he never doubted.

And he forgot all that he had learned, both the difficult French words which the young lady taught him in the drawing-room, and the incomparably easier expletivs which he had picked up on his own account in the servants' hall.

Only two human sounds clung to his memory, the last relics of his vanished learning. When he was in a thoroughly good humor, he would often say: "Bonjour, madame!" But when he was angry, he shrieked: "Go to the devil!"

Through the dense rain mist he sped swiftly and unswervingly; already he saw the white wreath of surf along the coast. Then he descried a great black waste stretching out beneath him. It was a peat moor.

It was encircled with farms on the hights around; but on the low plain—it must hav been over a mile long—there was no trace of human meddling; only a few stacks of peat on the outskirts, with black hummocks and gleaming water-holes between them.

"Bonjour, madame!" cried the old raven and began to wheel in great circles over the moor. It looked so inviting that he settled downward, slowly and wearily, and alighted upon a tree root in the midst of it.

Here it was just as in the old days—a silent wilderness. On some scattered patches of drier soil there grew a little short heather and a few clumps of rushes. They were withered; but on their stiff stems there still hung one or two tufts—black and sodden by the continuous rains. For the most part, the soil was fine, black, and crumbling—wet and full of water-holes. Gray and twisted tree roots stuck up above the surface, interlaced like gnarled network.

The old raven well understood what he saw. There had been trees here in the old times, before even his day.

The wood had disappeared—branches, leaves, everything was gone. Only the tangled roots remained, deep down in the soft mass of black fibers and water.

But further than this, change could not possibly go; so it must endure, and here, at any rate, men would hav to stint their meddling.

The old bird held himself erect. The farms lay so far away that he felt securely at home, here in the middle of the bottomless morass. One relic, at least, of antiquity must remain undisturbed. He smoothed his glossy black feathers and said several times, "Bonjour, madame!"

But down from the nearest farm came a couple of men with a horse and a cart; two small boys ran behind. They took a crooked course among the hummocks, but made as though to cross the morass.

"They must soon stop," thought the raven.

But they drew nearer and nearer; the old bird turned his head uneasily from side to side; it was strange that they should venture so far out.

At last they stopped, and the men set to work with spades and axes. The raven could see they were struggling with a huge root which they wanted to loosen.

"They will soon tire of that," thought the raven. But they did not tire. They hacked with their axes—the sharpest the raven had ever seen—they dug and hauled, and at last they actually got the huge stem turned over on its side, so that the whole tough network of roots stood straight up in the air.

The small boys wearied of digging canals between the water-holes. "Look at that great big crow over there," said one of them.

They armed themselvs with a stone in each hand and came sneaking forward behind the hummocks.

The raven saw them quite well. But that was not the worst thing it saw.

Not even out on the morass was antiquity to be left in peace. He had now seen that even the gray tree-roots, older than the oldest raven, and finely inwoven into the deep bottomless morass—that they even had to yield before the sharp axes.

And when the boys got so near that they were on the point of opening fire he raised his heavy wings and soared aloft.

But as soon he rose into the air and looked down upon the toiling men and the stupid boys, who stood gaping at him with a stone in each hand, a great wrath seized the old bird.

He swooped down upon the boys like an eagle, and while his great wings flounced about their ears he shrieked in a terrible voice, "Go to the devil!"

The boys gave a yell and threw themselvs upon the ground. When they presently turned and looked up again all was still and deserted as before. Far away a solitary blackbird winged to the westward.

But till they grew to be men—aye, even to their dying day—they were firmly convinced that the evil one himself had appeared to them out on the black morass in the form of a monstrous blackbird with eyes of fire.

But it was only an old raven, flying westward to unearth a sow's ear which it had buried.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

A COMMUNICATION from Ecuador complains that "in this, as in other South American states, the Masons and so-called Liberals never cease to persecute the church, and hav directed their efforts especially to drive religious instruction from the schools of a people who are exclusivly Catholic."

THE French republic this year attains its majority.

FIVE persons hav been killed in a crush of people at a cathedral entrance to see the Holy Coat.

A CATHOLIC congress at Malines is discussing means of practical application of the pope's labor encyclical to the working classes.

JESSE STITT, a boy of Seymour, Ind., subject to catalepsy, remained twenty-one days in his last fit, and on waking said he had spent that time in heaven.

OUTSIDE the south gate of Nanking, China, locusts are piled three to four inches deep. The provincial treasurer and other officials hav offered prayers in the temple for the succor of the crops.

ANDREW D. WHITE, ex-president of Cornell University, has lost the Republican nomination for governor of New York largely because of his "Warfare of Science" articles exposing church blunders and crimes.

THE sultan has prohibited entrance of the fugitiv Jews into Palestine. It is thought that Baron Hirsch should arrange with him for their admission. If the country were terraced, planted, and supplied with water reservoirs it would be highly productiv.

THE last letter of wife-murderer Bulling, hanged at Kansas City, Mo., on the 4th, concludes: "I hope to meet you in heaven. Please pray that I will be forgiven my sins. Ever yours in heaven. Lou Bulling."

RUSSIA may suffer great disorders soon. Poland's disaffection requires 500,000 soldiers to suppress it. Starving peasants threaten an uprising, with burning of houses and killing of landlords and officials. Landowners carry revolvers and keep many fire-arms in their bedrooms. Whatever relief funds are raised will doubtless be stolen, as they usually are, by officials.

MANY cardinals think that "so long as Rome is occupied by two hostil powers it is only in accord with the dignity and interests of the holy see that the conclave to elect a pope should be held upon foreign soil in order to frustrate the machinations of the civil power, and, above all, in order to renew in an efficacious manner the periodic protestations against the tyrannous statutes and the occupation of Rome by the Italian state."

THE famin impending in Russia will arise largely from the persecution of the Jews, who hav heretofore advanced to the thriftless Russian farmer money to secure the harvesting of his crops. Much of the crops that escaped frost and drouth lies rotting ungathered. "With a blind stupidity," says a dispatch, "which would be incredible if we had not the example of Spain in history, Russia has busied herself in destroying her most activ mercantil class just at the time when its help was most sorely needed to keep the country going at all."

To the suggestions that in event of a non-Italian being chosen pope Italy will confiscate the Vatican, Catholics threaten: "If a question as to the ownership and control of the Vatican should ever be raised by the Italian government it would be settled in a way and with a promptness not at all pleasant for that government. The Catholics of the whole world would 'want to know the reason why,' and the powers of the world would insist on having some knotty points considered before 'Italy' was permitted to put its robber hand on the home of the popes."

AT Chenango Falls, N. Y., last November, Miss May Walker, Methodist, was married by a Methodist clergyman to Gustave McGowan, Catholic. On their way home McGowan told his wife that unless they were married by a priest he could not recognize her as a wife without committing a sin. She, also being fanatical, would not go before a priest. They parted, and kept the marriage secret till recently, when it leaked out. McGowan told his wife's lawyers that he would not liv with her, as it would commit his soul to perdition. She has got a divorce.

HAMAN WAXETH WROTH AT MORDECAI.

And when Haman saw that Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence, then was Haman full of wrath.—Esther iii, 5.

Gems of Thought.

THE despotisms of the old world all rested and still rest upon the Bible. "The powers that be" were supposed to hav been "ordained of God;" and he who rose against his king periled his soul.—Ingersoll.

REFORM is thought pregnant with danger for all time that is present, but would hav been extremely profitable for that which is past, and will be highly salutary for that which is to come; therefore it has been thought expedient for all administrations which hav been, or that will be, but by any particular one which is, it is considered, like Scotch grapes, to be very seldom ripe, and by the time it is so, to be quite out of season.—Colton.

IGNORANCE of natural causes begat terror: terror, superstition: superstition, priests and the priesthood: whose interests and unbending efforts are exerted to perpetuate the fear, the ignorance, and the superstition that gave them birth.—Abner Kneeland.

EVEN with Christians of comparativly blameless lives their religion is injurious. It causes a waste of moral force. There are passionate desires of virtue, yearnings for the good, which descend from time to time like a holy spirit upon all cultivated minds, and from which, strange as it may seem, not even freethinkers are excluded. When such an impulse animates the godless man, he expends it in the service of mankind; the Christian wastes it on the air; he fasts, he watches, and he prays.—Reade.

THESE [Mosaic] laws not only fall short of a perfect morality, but they are distinctly and foully immoral, and tend directly to the brutalization of the nation which should liv under them. . . . It is time that it should be publicly acknowledged that the so-called Mosaic code is literally a mosaic of scattered fragments of legislation, of various ages, and various stages of civilization, put together a few hundred years before Christ.—Annie Besant.

ONE hoary sinner, on the bed of sickness, refused to repent, because he was not certain that death was so close at hand; and he did not wish for the trouble of going through the process twice, and was loth, by a premature amendment, to lose a chance of any of the indulgences of sin. Men would hav been far more scrupulous watchers over conduct, far more careful of their deeds, had they believed that those deeds would inevitably bear their natural consequences, exempt from after intervention, than when they held that penitence and pardon could at any time unlink the chain of sequences.—Greg.

BY degrees, the opinion that all men are possessed of the devil and damned was established, a strange idea without doubt, an execrable notion, a shocking outrage to the deity, to imagin that he has continually formed sensible and reasonable beings for the sole purpose of being tormented for ever by other beings, eternally themselvs plunged in torment. If the executioner who at Carlisle, in one day, tore out the hearts of eighteen of the party of the prince Charles-Edward, had been charged to establish a dogma, this is what he would hav chosen: yet he must hav been drunk; for had he even at once possessed the soul of an executioner and a theologian, he could never hav invented in cold blood a system in which so many thousands of infants at the breast are delivered to eternal tormentors.—Voltaire.

THE struggle for existence is a biological fact, which with mathematical necessity follows from the general disproportion between the average number of organic individuals and the numerical excess of their germs. But as adaptation and inheritance in the struggle for life are in continual interaction, it inevitably follows that natural selection, which everywhere influences and continually changes organic species, must, by making use of divergence of character, produce new species. Its influence is further especially favored by the activ and passiv migrations of organisms, which go on everywhere. If we giv these circumstances due consideration, the continual and gradual modification or transmutation of organic species will appear as a biological process, which must, according to causal law, of necessity follow from the actual nature of organisms and their mutual correlations.—Haeckel.

Notes and Clippings.

A ROMAN Catholic writes to the Sun: "Suppose a Roman Catholic president to be in the White House. The services of the United States are required for example in an arbitration between two European countries, one Protestant the other Catholic. The American president is asked to appoint arbitrators who shall favor the Catholic nation in the arbitration. The request is made by the pope. Now, let me ask your correspondents who deny that a Catholic president would come under the direct influence of the pope, how such a president, in such circumstances, could well refuse the request of the pope, made upon him as a matter of religion, so long as to grant the request implies no overt action not within the pale of good morals and religion. As a Roman Catholic, I surely think such a president, if he were a true Catholic, could not and would not refuse to grant such a request. Such a president, equally with a layman like myself, must, as a Roman Catholic, acknowledge the wish, the authority of the pope to be above any and all considerations. I am proud to assert, and free to acknowledge, my belief that a Roman Catholic president would be quite as much under the influence of the pope as I, a layman, an obscure citizen and earnest churchman, can be. I believe this to be the correct, the honorable, the only view of the question. The Protestants will respect us more for openly proclaiming what we believe than for attempting to conceal what must be perfectly clear to every sane man who is familiar with the policy of the church."

ARTICLE 188 of the Russian code says: "Those who leave the orthodox church for another Christian denomination will be given over to the ecclesiastical authorities for instruction, correction, and other church disciplin, and until they rejoin the church the government will take their children in order to preserve them from perversion by their parents' influence, and appoint guardians for them of the orthodox faith. The erring parents will be forbidden to liv with their children."

CATHOLICS dislike the French law enforcing military service of theological students.

IN a late number of the Independent, Dr. Ives Curtiss givs a very full and candid account of the higher criticism in its relation to the Old Testament. He shows that it denies the Pentateuch to be in any specific sense the work of Moses; that the prophetical writings are a mosaic from unknown writers; that Ecclesiastes was not by Solomon; that the book of Chronicles was the history of Israel, rewritten with a bias; that the book of Daniel was a late production, and that the "Old Testament history is not trustworthy." Naturally at the close he asks, "What remains that can be maintained?"

EVERY one of the agricultural fairs that will be held in New Jersey this year, and every fair that will be held during the winter in the parlors of a church, will be in violation of a state law, the wording of which is brief and sententious. It reads: "That no fair or fairs shall hereafter be held in any city, town, or place in this state." The law is still on the statute books of the state, and has never been repealed. The date of its passage is Jan. 27, 1797. The reasons for its enactment remain shrouded in antiquity.

A CHANGE THAT BROUGHT RELIEF.

IT is satisfactory to learn that the cholera mortality among pilgrims to Mecca this year reaches the unprecedented number of 11,000. It is satisfactory because it is pleasant to think of so considerable a number of fellow-creatures going straight to their own paradise. It is almost startling to consider, too, that this band will require the ministrations of 770,000 black-eyed houris, of which seventy are assigned to each Mussulman in the abodes of bliss.

THERE is agitation in Rome against the Catholic Order of the Buried Alive. The nuns hold no intercourse whatever with the world. The only means of communication with the convent is "the barrel," so-called, which fills an opening in the wall and revolves, when one knocks thereon, until it shows an open section, wherein are placed whatever gifts or messages are intended for the nuns, who liv wholly on charity, keep two Lents a year, and never eat flesh meat.

THE question of religion should never appear in politics; but, alas! it does, right here in Rhode Island.—Providence Record.

DARWIN will be remembered as long as Newton. Darwinism means much more than the speculativ results attained by the genius of one man. It means little less than a new way of looking at existence. It is to the nineteenth century what the discovery of the New World was to the sixteenth.—Post.

THERE are said to be but few people in England who can rival Mrs. Annie Besant in dinner-table oratory. Her voice is clear and melodious and her mental grasp of the subject under discussion is remarkable. Her great speech at Westminster Hall in her own defense before the chief-justice of England won the admiration of the queen's attorney-general. —World.

WITH famin stalking in the train of incipient rebellion, and confiscation and official corruption promoting both; with crops left rotting on the ground for want of money to move them, and new demands piling up for an empty treasury to satisfy, the condition of over-Christian Russia is the most portentous fact in contemporary history.

UNDER the plea of "doctrinal growth," the disintegration of Protestantism has gone so far that its ministers openly impugn the infallibility of the very Bible itself. Instead of Protestantism having reformed the faith of the world, the critical unbelieving spirit of the world has undermined the faith of Protestantism. The Reformers sowed the wind, and their children are reaping the whirlwind. —Catholic Review.

IT is not generally known that Father Anderledy, the general of the order of the Jesuits, and who has been nicknamed "The Black Pope," spent a considerable part of his career in this country. It was here that he received ordination as priest, and for many years he was the parish priest at Green Bay, Wis.

Communications.

Spirit Analysis.

A spirit is matter, not immaterial. . . . A spirit passes through solids, glass, iron, wood, and solid walls, as light, heat, magnetism, and electricity pass through various substances without making a hole.—W. L. Willis.

Our good, and, no doubt, honest brother Willis, like all other Spiritualists, entirely ignores the important fact that, if a spirit body or being is a reality, it must be organic—organized, living, breathing, automatically acting matter. It must be, as is conceded by all prominent Spiritists, a counterpart of man. It must possess the outline, shape, size, form, and characteristics of man. Being organic and material, and possessing functions like man, this spirit body must contain within itself a counterpart of all the physical organs of man. Being a living, material being or person, this necessitates all the internal organs which alone constitute such living person. It necessitates blood or similar life fluid. This necessitates arteries, veins, the heart and its associate organs to propel and circulate such fluid throughout the organism, without which processes no organic or individual life is possible. And these organs, channels, ducts, etc., must be of sufficient retentiv quality to resist the action of such fluids now and during all eternity.

In the absence of the physical organism, which at death is consigned to disintegration, is the survival of such spirit counterpart of man (which is invisible to normal sight, and without weight, color, or tangibility) thinkable, reasonable? Is it within reach of common understanding and scientific analysis? Will Brother Willis kindly explain its characteristics, its constituents, its circulating organs, heart, veins, arteries, life fluid, etc.?

"What does not breathe does not liv," is an axiom of science. A spirit livs, hence must breathe. Breathing necessitates lungs or organs to breathe, and channels leading in and out of the body. These, of necessity, must be composed of material of sufficient tenacity to hold and confine the air (breath) while in the body supplying the requisit elements to sustain the life processes. In the absence of the physical lungs—the only kind known to science—are such spiritual lungs or organs thinkable and within reach of scientific analysis? If a spirit is transparent like air, light as air (for they are supposed to float in the air), what organized material known to man can thus float unseen, contain and confine the air of a breathing, living being, yet not weigh a grain?

If not miracle, what is it?

Organic life necessitates food. From crudest form of plant life to highest form of animal life this is the imperativ rule. Organic life necessitates a continuous supply of those substances which it consumes and assimilates and upon which supplies it depends for existence. The flower, shrub, and tree require heat, light, moisture, and many necessary elements from the soil for their existence. The crudest form of animal life is merely a sac or stomach, which absorbing, digesting, and assimilating food enables it to liv. So the higher animals require a continual supply of food to supply the necessary chemistry to sustain the life process. Hence a stomach and its connecting channels and organs are an absolute necessity to all organic, living beings. This implies eating, drinking, digestion, and assimilation of food, chemical processes, and excretion, necessitating not a supply of air solely, but also of good, substantial, nutritious food, such as fluids, bread, fruits, cabbages, fish, meat, etc., all well known, but whose "spiritual counterpart" is entirely unknown to man.

Now, will Brother Willis please define the nature of a spiritual stomach, and these spiritual, digestiv, and respiratory processes? How can such airy organs resist the chemical processes which they of necessity are continually subjected to? What confines these fluids in their proper organs and prevents the same from percolating or leaking (!) through before the body has time to assimilate the same? Please also define the quality and kind of food, where procured, how prepared, particulars about breakfast, dinner, supper, dining-rooms, kitchens, etc.

He cannot do it. And if twenty prominent Spiritists or mediums were asked at one and the same time to giv their testimony concerning such practical matter, we would obtain twenty widely divergent answers, all proving that no knowledge concerning such things exists anywhere.

I insist that the characteristics, components, and capabilities of a spirit body are utterly incomprehensible and absolutely beyond scientific analysis. There is nothing in nature analogous to it. All material forms (and Brother Willis insists that spirits are such forms) are in continual process of change. All beings begin, are conceived, born, evolve to maturity, then retrogress, decay, die, and that is the inexorable fate not only of all organic orms, but of all forms and bodies indiscriminately. What begins must end. When the material form which has now evolved into W. L. Willis was born this material form was named W. L. Willis. This material form then was and now is W. L. Willis. During the eternity of beginningless time preceding this event this identical form or individual form did not exist. It required the mingling of the male and female elements of his parents to create, form, or originate this form. This form or body begotten by his parents is W. L. Willis. It began to exist individually some time after the union of his parents and did and could not possibly exist before. It is an organic form possessing numerous functions and performing many physical and chemical processes, which in their united, harmonious automatic action produce life, cause circulation, digestion, respiration, generate magnetism, electricity, mind, and consciousness.

Now, whether or not we are as yet far enough advanced in the subtle science of psychology to accurately define the processes originating mind, it must be conceded that the human anatomy, in its complex and wonderful construction, supplies at least a rational basis for mind if not a solution for the subtle problem. We hav at least a cause for the effect, a reason for mentation. We represent the crowning work of nature, the final achievement of the involuntary potencies of matter, "struggling" during an eternity to create a man. Is it strange that such sublime organism can manifest the genius of an Angelo, Mozart, Bryant, or Ingersoll? But, in the name of reason I ask, what rational grounds hav we to believe, when this magnificent form which originated man, with all his physical and mental functions, dies, is buried—every grain of it—when its constituents hav assumed other forms, when the last tangible vestige of its individuality exists no more, that then a counterpart of this form, endowed with identical outline and performing identical processes, can still exist and continue to exist in eternal statu quo, without this physical form as well as with it?

If not miracle, if not effect without a cause, what is it?

Can the outline and form of a tree remain when cut down and consumed by fire? Can the sap continue to circulate through its fibers when it exists no more? Can it exist through all eternity when all the chemical elements necessary to its existence hav been scattered to the four winds of heaven and, combined with other elements, hav assumed other forms?

Is not the material the tree is composed of necessary to the origin and continuation of the tree? Is not this organized material the tree? If the physical organism then is a necessity to the origin of man, must it not of necessity be a necessity to the continuation of man? Is it not the man? Is without it—without flesh, blood, and bones—man thinkable? Is thought possible without brains, sensation without a nervous system, sight without eyes, sound without ears, etc.? Science says, No! Extinguish all organic forms from the face of the earth and universal darkness, silence, and unconsciousness would reign supreme. The crash of worlds, the belching forth of mountains of fire as from the craters of the sun, would not be seen, heard, or felt. Mind, therefore, necessitates physical organization to generate or produce it.

What form in nature is eternal? Is not continual change in form the first great vital law of nature, and which law of nature alone secures the perpetuation and eternal activity of the universe? If even one atom only per year were abstracted from the infinit whole to create an immortal soul and this atom not returned from whence it came, all, indeed—the abstracting process also being eternal—would now be such immortal souls but no universe!

Spiritists, blinded by their morbid desire to change the order of nature and thus liv forever, will not see but persistently ignore the vast difference between the inorganic elements, forces and kinds of matter which are forever the same and in that sense immortal, and organized matter, which is in no two days alike, continually changing and hence mortal. The one simply aggregations of infinitesimal particles, segregated beyond conception and small enough to pass with ease through the "pores" of glass, wood, rock, iron, etc., similar to water or flour passing through a sieve or screen; the other a counterpart of man, two by six, organic, a living complex organism; a material being (as Brother Willis concedes—and must or he could not postulate a being at all!) every part essential to the existence of the whole.

How can such a being go through a stone wall, Brother Willis, without "making a hole?" How can it, he, or she, penetrate a window-pane as light, heat, or electricity can without smashing it? Is there no difference in your opinion between fluids, dust, or flour passing through a sieve or perforation and a living human body—the counterpart of man—getting through the same small holes and instantly reorganizing again a full-fledged man or woman? Or does it, he, or she, crawl all through one small hole? (You would hardly expect a hard-headed Materialist to believe this!) We can imagin how respiration can occur through the skin, but how the entire man could get through, and both skin and man survive the operation, is a different thing. We can imagin magnetic currents, light, and heat passing through the pores of glass, each separated for the time being by the glass itself, then instantly uniting again in aggregated form by the law of attraction, but how an organic, living man, woman, or child can, for the time being, be so segregated into a mass of inorganic atoms as to pass through the pores of glass or a brick wall, and then by some occult force, unknown to science, unite again into a perfect living being—this I insist is a problem entirely beyond human comprehension.

If not a miracle, what is it?

If our good brother cannot explain all these mysteries incident to spirit existence, what is the use of continually illustrating the existence of ethereal existences and their mode of perambulations by gases, vapors, or inorganic forces of nature which hav absolutely nothing in common and which are not at all analogous to spirit-forms and all they imply? Can vapor, gases, heat, etc., think, love, reason? If not, please do not in the future compare them to spirit, but prove otherwise the reality of immortal organic forms.

Such forms being invisible to all of normal vision alike, unthinkable, beyond scientific analysis, without component parts, I insist that to submit them in explanation of so-called "spirit-phenomena" is not explaining but substituting an infinitly greater mystery for the lesser.

And if a spirit were actually produced would not the psychical problem be as far from solution as now?

But if a spirit exists it must be subject to the laws of other organic beings. This implies that it would be visible to all of normal sight, not to a scattered few. It implies that it is subject to change and death, and, consequently, like all other organisms, can not be immortal. It implies that if crushed, struck by a cannon-ball, run over by an engin, decapitated, or "blown up" by dynamite this organism—if real—can no more escape injury or destruction than the physical, and consequently cannot be immortal!

I do not now and never hav cried "fraud" and "ridiculed" our friends the Spiritualists, and all I ask of Spiritists is that they treat me as well as I do them.

OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Rochelle, Ill., Sept. 6 1891.

Our London Letter.

For some time past Mrs. Besant has been drifting further and further from the principles held by the National Secular Society, and the farewell address she gave at the Hall of Science last Sunday could scarcely be considered unexpected; the strange part of the affair is that she did not giv it long since. Her statement that she was turned off by the society was entirely misleading and quite erroneous, as she had full freedom to lecture on any subject at the hall at the free lectures on Sunday mornings, but as the evening lectures are devoted solely to the diffusion of Freethought principles, it is not likely that anyone could be permitted to lecture on another topic, and that in total opposition to those principles. Mrs. Besant knew the rules of the society well enough, and would no doubt hav opposed any such innovation when she herself was a vice-president. It was, therefore, most unfair of her to pose as a victim to what has been termed by religious papers as the bigotry of Secularism. If she no longer believes in Secularism she has always the power to oppose it after the evening lectures, but this would not suit her purpose, and it will be much better, taking all things into consideration, that she never appears on a Secularist platform again here or elsewhere. Owing to her long connection with the party she has been allowed greater facilities of airing her views in Secular halls than any other person, and up to the present her Christian champions, who for the purpose of discrediting Freethought profess to regard her as a much-wronged person, hav not offered her their buildings in which to descant on her grievances and opinions.

As during the Parliamentary vacation the daily papers are glad of any new sensation, one of them is devoting several of its columns to a course of correspondence on Mrs. Besant's wrongs in general and Theosophy in particular, but with all the efforts being made to elicit something on the latter subject, the public is very much in the dark as to what it really is, and from all appearances not much information is likely to be gained; the only point yet made at all clear is that the initiated know all about it but are not allowed to talk, and in the face of the reported statement that the chief object of Theosophy is for the improvement of the human race, individually and collectivly, it is difficult to see how this desirable object is to be attained if no one is to know but the very few how it is to be done. If the Mahatmas so earnestly desire to benefit mankind, it is a pity they so selfishly bury themselvs in the remotest parts of Thibet, where no one can get at them, and the aerial messages they are credited with sending are about on a par with Spiritualistic manifestations. It would require a person to be very much initiated to see how the production of marvelous odors "pouring out" of a crevice in a stone, or mysterious letters on equally mysterious paper coming from nowhere particular, or imaginary cobras conjured out of sticks, can be of any practical avail in ameliorating the ills and troubles of poor humanity. It is a poor argument, that because there are more things in nature than are now understood or even imagined, therefore there is no reason to doubt the "truth" of Theosophy; that will apply to any new fad in supernaturalism, and would at one time hav been derided by the new prophetess.

It would almost seem by the light of present events that Mrs. Besant simply believed in Charles Bradlaugh and not in Secularism itself. But while it is open to every professing Secularist to alter his or her views, it is absurd to suppose that such a one should still expect to be treated as on the same footing as before the secession, and it would be far more honest and dignified in the seceder to quietly retire from the society than to make a theatrical display and whine like a spoiled child.

Freethought has existed from time immemorial, and in the nature of things must exist, and even though any particular society may be dissolved, still Freethought itself cannot be killed.

Mrs. Besant need not flatter herself that she has in any way deteriorated the work of the National Secular Society; her splenetic attack will rather prove a good advertisment, and make many who hav never given the subject a thought giv some consideration to it, and so increase the numbers of those who are the avowed opponents of any form of superstition. Another Look at Colonel Ingersoll.

Special Correspondence Boston Advertiser.

Max O'Rell, in his little book, "Jonathan and His Continent," says that Robert Ingersoll "is a personality apart." To this I subscribe. But he also says that "Americans are unanimous in admitting Ingersoll's extraordinary talents." If this be so, it must be an "admission by default," for comparativly few Americans know anything at all about him. Ingersoll is better known as the "great Infidel" than as anything else, and knowing him as such the average American wishes to seek no further. I think it safe to assert that the vast majority of Americans hav no idea of what a marvelous mind is running its course among us in this latter part of the nineteenth century. If anyone doubts this, let him inquire how many of his immediate circle are familiar with the writings of Robert Ingersoll. You will find few, I think, who hav done more than cast a furtiv and timid glance at some of his tracts on religious or irreligious subjects.

Very many people, far from being familiar with Ingersoll's writings, are ignorant of the fact that he has written anything other than polemics. It is not uncommon to receive this answer: "No, I hav not read Ingersoll's writings, and I do not want to." And this, perhaps, is only another proof of the truth of Lord Houghton's observation that "It is remarkable how few people hav 'grown-up' minds."

Robert Ingersoll must be described by the word "genius," for by no other word can this strangely contradictory character be explained. The mental equipment of this man is that of a logician, a philosopher, a poet, and an artist in the most general sense of the word.

Robert Ingersoll possesses in its most perfect form the charm of personal magnetism. All who come in contact with him, no matter how deeply prejudiced at the outset, leave him with kindlier feelings, and the wealth of his brain obscures all those minor traits of mind and renders insignificant all those trivial personal habits which go so far in forming our opinion of the mediocre man.

In the first place, Ingersoll is a brilliant conversationalist, or, perhaps I should say, "monologist," because when he begins to talk most people are charmed into silence. He talks with ease and grace upon subjects of which you would suppose him ignorant, often amazing a specialist with his knowledge of the specialty. An omnivorous reader, he has the faculty of digesting a book, of getting at and retaining its salient points to the exclusion of the padding and the unimportant. Scarcely anything in the line of reading escapes him. Novels, history, poetry, the Koran, and yesterday's trash, he has read them all. His memory is marvelous. "I hav what I call 'The Fool's Memory,'" said he to me one day. "I can remember the number of a page on which I saw certain sentences, and can often tell whether it was the right or left hand page, and how many lines from the top or bottom."

His memory for the works of Shakspere is particularly noticeable. Quotations from the great dramatist, always perfectly apt and correct, he has at his tongue's end. Indeed Shakspere is his Bible, and in Colonel Ingersoll's opinion no other writer, and, I might almost say, no other man, deserves to be mentioned in the same breath with Shakspere. I remember once hearing Colonel Ingersoll say that he never heard of Shakspere until he was about twenty years of age, when a chance incident happened to put him in possession of a copy of "King Lear," and the reading of that play marked the beginning of a passionate love for its author which to-day amounts almost to worship. He is a great admirer of the writings of Charles Dickens and in this connection it is interesting to note that when Dickens was in America, Ingersoll was invited to meet him at dinner and flatly refused to do so, being greatly offended by the caricature of America and Americans drawn by Dickens in "Martin Chuzzlewit." The colonel told me that he had never ceased to regret missing this opportunity of meeting the great novelist, and remarked that he now enjoyed the description of "the flourishing town of Eden and its inhabitants" as much as anybody. Victor Hugo is another author with whom Colonel Ingersoll is wonderfully conversant.

I once had a talk with Ingersoll on novels, and in the course of it asked him which of the novels he had read he considered the greatest. "Les Miserables," he answered without a moment's hesitation. "It has no equal. But a 'Tale of Two Cities' would be perhaps my second choice." Colonel Ingersoll is a very observant and sometimes a very severe critic. I will own that he has spoiled several things for me by pointing out faults which otherwise I should probably never hav noticed. Of Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg he said: "What a pity Lincoln put seven useless 'heres' in those wonderful lines." I now see those 'heres' glaring at me every time I read that speech. And of Bryant's "Thanatopsis" he said: "How do you suppose Bryant ever fell into the error of saying: 'Thou go not like the quarry slave at night scourged to his dungeon.' No quarry slave ever needed scourging to drive him from his work at night to his dungeon. What Bryant must hav meant was—'at morn scourged from his dungeon.'"

I hav spoken before of Colonel Ingersoll's faculty of digesting his reading. This I consider is due in great measure to the wonderful mind concentration of which he is capable. Of this I hav seen many evidences, and in this connection I am reminded of an incident that happened in one of the branches of the now celebrated Bell telephone case. Colonel Ingersoll had been retained to make the oral argument before the supreme court of the United States. For weeks the various counsel had been trying to make appointments for the purpose of coaching Ingersoll on the fine points of the case. Failing in this they engaged a compartment in the parlor car which was to take them down to Washington, intending thus to utilize the journey to prepare their orator. Unfortunately for their plans, the colonel walked through the smoking car, and seeing an old acquaintance, dropped into an adjoining seat, and that was the last the anxious lawyers saw of him until Washington was reached. At Washington a bath and dinner occupied the most of the evening, and it was well on to midnight before the refractory colonel was corraled and coached by his junior counsel. Imagin any subject being elucidated by three or four lawyers at once! Least of all the intricate subject of telephone law. The wee sma' hours saw the colonel escaping from his instructors. The case was argued in the forenoon of that morning, and I hav heard it said by those who listened to the colonel's speech that the law of telephones was never before so clearly stated—not a salient point had been neglected. He had won that case in the smoking car from New York to Washington.

Those who hav read the wonderful prose-poem, "Life," written by Colonel Ingersoll as a parallel to "The Seven Ages of Man," will scarcely believe that this work was conceived and written in a railroad train on the journey from New York to Washington. But such the author tells me is the fact.

In addition to being an industrious reader (where he gets time for it no one knows), Colonel Ingersoll is a great lover of music and a good judge of it, though he is personally no musician; and using this expression makes me tell a story at my own expense.

One day Colonel Ingersoll said to me, "L———, are you fond of music?" "I am, colonel," I replied, "but I am no musician." "Well, that's a silly answer," said he; "you might just as well reply, if I asked you if you liked cake, 'Yes, but I'm no cook.'"

Wagner is his favorit composer, as Shakspere is his favorit author. He idolizes both. In a breach of promis case not long ago, the evidence showed that the defendant had taken his alleged fiancee to the German opera—to "Tristan and Isolde" and others. In summing up a rather forlorn hope defense, the colonel said, "Gentlemen, you hav heard that the defendant frequently took the plaintiff to the German opera—there to hear the masterpieces of Wagner—those waterfalls of melody. The man who has conferred such a benefit on a woman should not be subjected by her to a suit of this kind. That should absolve him!" Ingersoll is a passionate admirer of the dramatic art, and all his life long has been a champion of the stage. Here, as in many other things, his opinions differ widely from the recognized critics. But his opinions never lack reasons and his reasons never lack force. I hav heard him assert time and again, in that dictatorial positiv manner which of itself carries conviction, that Julia Marlowe is the greatest living actress, because she acts naturally. "Too much polish," he says, "suggests insincerity." He could not endure the finished acting of Coquelin and Hading. For Edwin Booth and Joseph Jefferson he has expressions of enthusiastic admiration. His standard of criticism here is, as I hav said, an individual one, but it is also one of a high order, and few are the actors and actresses of whom I hav heard him speak in high terms. A poor reading of Shakspere irritates him greatly, and I hav heard him severely criticise some well-known actors for not studying their roles sufficiently to enable them to act their characters consistently.

Thus in "Romeo and Juliet." He says the point is utterly lost by making Romeo and Tybalt fence all over the stage when a correct interpretation of Romeo's character and the scene would be a frenzied rush, resulting in something like a murder.

There is scarcely a prominent lawyer in New York who has not smarted under the lash of Ingersoll's satire, which, however, is almost always delivered with a smile that takes away much of the sting. "Colonel Ingersoll and I generally differ as to what the law is," sneeringly remarked a well-known member of the New York bar. "Yes," flashed back the colonel, "if we didn't I should hav some doubt about my being right."

"I never think of England," said he again, "without being reminded of a burglar with a white necktie."

Master of the art of invectiv, Ingersoll seldom uses it—holding that "epithets are not arguments." But I once heard him at his best, denouncing a man who had brought an uncalled-for accusation against his wife in a suit for divorce. "Gentlemen of the jury," said the colonel, his eyes flashing with anger and contempt, "I mark out in the plaintiff the meanest man I know. A man so mean that nature wasted her time in making him, and the dirt of which he is composed would hav been better employed filling the grave of another such man, if such another lives!"

It is at this time impracticable to do more than enumerate some of Ingersoll's writings, which entitle him to rank foremost among American prose writers—exclusiv of the polemics which hav given him more notoriety than fame. Would it be considered extravagant to say that Ingersoll is one of the greatest Shaksperian scholars in the world? I am willing to abide by the decision of those who hav read his essay on Shakspere, and who are themselvs at all familiar with the Shaksperian critics. Is it possible to believe that a complete history of Napoleon could be drawn in less than two hundred lines? If not, read De Bourrienne's three ponderous tomes on the life of Napoleon, and then see what Ingersoll has neglected in his reflections at the tomb of the "man of destiny."

"Life," "Crimes Against Criminals," "A Vision of War," "Henry Ward Beecher," "Roscoe Conkling," "Cuba," "Woman." These are a few of the many essays and prose poems from the pen of this "marvelous, many-sided" man. No one can fully know the possibilities of the English language until he has read them. LOPHOS.

Success.

The strongest ship may breast a gale,
And yet be driven back.
What though to land in port she fail,
Shall we declare she could not sail
Because she had to tack?

Though storms belate and plagues impede,
Though aches and ills betide—
Ambition's goal may not be won—
Yet hast thou bravely, nobly done,
If thou hast bravely tried.

"He nobly does who nobly dares"
When trials sore oppress.
When perseverance nought can shake,
Though failure follows in his wake,
His failure is success.

The fiercest battles are to fight,
The strongest forts to scale;
The truest heroes they who fall,
The endeavors grandest of them all
Those made by ones who fail.

News and Notes.

It was harvest time about Bozeman when I reached there. The fields glittered like gold and the farmers were busy. They had to improve each shining hour. It was a bad time for lectures. Only a few were present in the new and elegant opera house. Enough, however, for a short address on the "Demands of Liberalism." On my next round I will not strike Bozeman until the crops are gathered. There is a large Liberal element all about here. But it is no use to lecture when the land echoes and re-echoes with the music of a hundred machines.

I was glad to meet old friends here—Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Lindley, Thomas Burke, Fred Buchtel, and others. Judge Luce, who introduced me four years ago to a crowded house, is now on the sick list, and could not be with us; but his heart is in the cause. J. V. Bogert, now mayor of the city, introduced me on this occasion. He is not afraid to stand by the colors be there few or many. The Avant Courier and its editors are on the right side, and when the time comes this go-ahead journal speaks to the point. J. R. Scahill is enrolled on THE TRUTH SEEKER list, and I hope for more hereafter. I hav faith in Bozeman. It has a very large Liberal element. It is growing also. Many beautiful buildings hav been erected since I was here before. The Hotel Bozeman rivals the best-appointed hotels of larger places. A fine country stretches about the city. It is a lovely summer residence. The vast array of mountains, blue and dazzling, encircle the glittering plains. The nights are cool. Bozeman is one of the jewels of Montana, and Montana is indeed a splendid state. Its resources are many. It is rich, and as you ride along from Bozeman to Helena, and on to Missoula, in this gorgeous September weather—plains mingling with blue hills—enchanting prospects arise. At Helena I hav the good fortune to come across Mr. and Mrs. A. N. Sires, our old friends of Spokane. They are coming back to Spokane after residing for a year at Great Falls.

Spokane is a little bit dull, but it is a handsome city, and believes in its destiny. It is an attractiv place. Its business blocks are superb, and the country about glitters with elegant homes.

I met with J. H. C. Scurlock, who has been here about a year—an earnest Liberal, who has done some good fighting for our cause in Spokane papers. His articles in answer to clerical assumptions are excellent. Through his generous efforts arrangements were made for a lecture in the Unitarian church on my return from Colville.

Colville is a banner town. It is a quiet place just now, but a charming resort. As we come into the valley beautiful scenes are on every side—the grassy fields and the groves and the lofty and far encircling hills. The day is luminous, and it is like traveling in Switzerland as we behold the rugged and picturesque landscape. Colville valley is famous for its hay. Long stacks are seen about the many farmhouses. Noble herds are wandering over the ample meadows. The hay commands $10 a ton, and two or three tons are raised to the acre. This is a good income. Round about Colville, on to the Columbia river and beyond, the heart of the mountains is laden with wealth. Gold, silver, lead, etc., are found here, and eventually the streams of prosperity will flow from a hundred mines.

The Christians hav built a church since I was here, but they hav not paid for it, and it is likely to be sold out of their hands. So this outward evidence of the church's power counts for but little. As a matter of fact Colville is a Liberal town. The majority of its people are outside the churches. I hav not found better audiences anywhere. The court-house was filled to its utmost capacity, and taking it all in all I must say that Colville is a banner town.

William Graham, and his wife, Maggie Hope Graham, who is a valuable contributor to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, are located here, and the North Star House shines with comfort for the traveler. The Grahams are stanch supporters of Liberalism. They giv and they work freely. J. J. Carscadden, of the Dominion Hotel, is a splendid ally. I enjoyed the hospitality of himself and wife. David Barman also lends a hand. Alf Olsen is on the list. H. G. Kirkpatrick, Mr. Hammond, Dr. Kaulbac, Fred Hass, E. G. Swain, John Dempsey, Mr. and Mrs. John Day, who came eighteen miles to attend the lecture; Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Barker, James Durkin, John Rickey, A. A. Barnett, H. Baum, Julius Albino, who burns with the fires of Italy for Freethought; I. H. McKenzie, A. Schipps, etc., are our co-workers here also. Eleven new names are added to THE TRUTH SEEKER roll. In every respect it was a successful campaign at Colville. I shall come here as often as I can, for there is ever a cordial welcome.

I was sorry not to see my old friend, R. A. Prouty, and his sons. The father is over eighty years old and still keeps in the harness. John Stewart Dick is with us from his ranch nine miles out. The Old Dominion mine is six miles east of Colville and employs thirty men. The smelter, which has done a good deal of work, is not now running, but soon will be, it is expected. Sunday afternoon Carscadden gave me a drive to the old fort and the old town, about three miles from the new town. Colville is named from the Colville tribe of Indians. The fort was established many years ago. The Catholics also built a mission house here and most of the Indians on the reserve are now Catholics. The lands about Colville are held at about $100 an acre if cleared. This is an excellent fruit country. Game and fish are plenty. The climate is delightful. The valley in which Colville is situated makes a lovely picture, with the immense hills towering with rock and forest inclosing its green bosom. Colville does not hav "great expectations." It will not be like Spokane, but it has a fine outlook for a city some day of ten thousand people. The productiv soil and the rich mineral deposits around, these resources when developed will make one of the most prosperous sections of the country. I. W. Haffstetter is founder of the town. He was a soldier in the service of the United States, and when his term of enlistment expired took up a claim upon the present town site. Two papers are published here, the Miner and the Republican.

I leave Colville Monday, September 14th. On Monday evening I lecture at Spokane. A fine audience is present, and I am sorry that I could not arrange to giv one or two more lectures. Rev. Mr. Wilson of the Unitarian church is broad and Liberal in his views and preaching. The Jewish rabbi who was present is equally advanced. My address on "Demands of Liberalism" was indorsed by these religious leaders. The audience was very appreciativ. Evidently a good deal could be done at Spokane by a series of lectures. Many who call themselvs Freethinkers are indifferent. Most of the friends I met here four years ago are scattered to different parts of the Pacific coast. But there are new ones ready for the work. I am much indebted to Mr. Scurlock for the success of the present meeting. He has taken hold of the matter with unflinching courage. Dr. Cary, who introduced me at the lecture, is an unflinching Liberal. I was pleased to meet with Mr. and Mrs. O. Jeldness; Jeldness is an old-time comrade of Portland memories. He always makes a good time for the Secular pilgrim. He has been married since I saw him last, and this was the first opportunity to greet his wife, a true Liberal, and I am sure that golden joys are on this blended path. Long lives to our comrades. I was pleased to meet also with Mrs. Dr. Latham, who is not afraid to express her Liberal ideas, and contributes frequently to the papers. She is now writing a novel, of which the "heavy villain" is an orthodox clergyman. In many cases this is not contrary to the fact.

The ground is broken at Spokane and the work for the future is hopeful. I like this brilliant metropolis. It has plenty of energy. Its business men are go-ahead. It has many resources. It commands the trade of a large section of the country.

A good report of the lecture was published in the Spokane Review. The papers of this city are willing at times to giv Freethought a fair chance. The Chronicle has printed bold and able attacks upon the popular theology and the clergymen do not hav it all their own way. Mr. Scurlock has given them successful battle in the columns of the Chronicle.

Samuel Elder has joined THE TRUTH SEEKER ranks, and I hope to hav more enlisted after a while.

Spokane, Sept. 15, 1891. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Atkinson Incubator.

Having traced the slanderous falsehood charging six murders in Girard College to its apparent source, namely, T. A. Atkinson, pastor of S. M. church, Ukiah, Cal., and as a result found it pronounced by the vice-president of the College to be "utterly false," the result of the inquiry would seem to suggest the propriety of further investigation, so that, at least, we may thereby be the better able to place a somewhat just estimate on the clerical labors of Brother Atkinson as related to the church and likewise as related to Freethinkers and skeptics—or "Infidels," as termed by orthodox believers. In giving two sermons on the exposition of what he terms Infidelity he undoubtedly realized the importance of the work, and assumed the responsibility of indulging without stint in disparaging and criminating charges against Infidels, representing them as grossly and willfully ignorant, and so few in number that about six was all he was able to compute in this populous region of country, and he presumed not one was capable of teaching a common district school. This last charge may possibly be correct, and whether or not I shall not pretend to dispute, as I consider common-school teaching and theological teaching as two distinctivly different branches diametrically opposed to each other, about as near antipodal as we can make the comparison. The first says, investigate and decide; theology says, believe or be damned. Therefore enough on this branch of his subject—although this may be the broad foundation upon which he presumed to rear his colossal bugbear superstructure of "six murdered professors in Girard College."

Whatever may hav been his object in resorting to vituperation and detraction to this extent, we were not at all prepared for such an outburst of calumny, and would fain believe that a gentleman of his cloth must hav felt himself hard pressed to sustain his point, and unfortunately allowed his credulity to run riot over his judgment and sense of duty and justice, in his great anxiety to serve the church after the manner of the early church fathers, who considered it a virtue to lie for the benefit of the church.

But a word more about the common school, the palladium of liberty, representing free thought and free speech, investigation and intelligence and truth, all of which skeptics not only freely subscribe and indorse, but as a rule are activ propagandists of the common school and do not believe in the doctrin of lying, not even for the "benefit of the church."

Of course, we are willing to admit that in our present state of society none of us know any too much, even including friend Atkinson; consequently Freethinkers hav, in addition to common schools, not only a decided penchant for the higher and scientific branches, but hav freely given of their means for the erection of grand and colossal institutions of learning for the general propagation of scientific knowledge and real substantial information—the Girard College standing at the head of the list, valued at $20,000,000, a fair representativ of this class of Liberal institutions for the propagation of science, to say nothing of the lesser institutions of a similar character—such as the Peter Cooper institute of New York, and the James Lick observatory and public baths (for the indigent) of California.

And all these institutions are not only for the general benefit of mankind, but more especially for the benefit of the indigent and unfortunate. The Girard College being specifically (by the testator) dedicated to the especial benefit of orphan boys, to the entire exclusion of theology and theologians; carefully guarding the institution, as it were, with a flaming sword "turning every way," in order to effectually guard, to the extent of one forty acres of consecrated ground, the earth's surface against the encroachments of that hydra-headed monster Theology, so that it might be forever indemnified against its tortuous, serpentine, slimy imprint, even within the inclosure of this holy of holies. So mote it be.

This essentially Radical prohibitory clause in the testator's will may explain the secret of the Atkinson bombardment of the Girard College. In a fit of jealousy and despair of ever being permitted to find rest for the sole of his foot within the precincts of this holy of holies, he may hav, as a dernier resort, concluded to follow the example and motto of the church fathers, if not for the benefit of the church, at least for the disparagement of the Girard College and Freethinkers generally as a class. Then, after having thrown up his hat for the bombardment of Fort Sumter and "crossed the last ditch" in behalf of the perpetuation of that peculiarly "divine institution," and now finding himself elevated to the pastorate of the "Confederate" church of Ukiah; why should it be considered a strange thing for him to be found bombarding the walls of Girard College by tooting his "ram's horn" from the pulpit of the Confederate church in the "flaming-lamp enlightened" city of Ukiah?

And even at this late date of progress and intelligence we find him a sympathizer and activ propagandist of that branch of theology which a few years since crossed the "last ditch" in a struggle for the utter disruption and overthrow of the grandest institution known to man, namely, the grand and glorious democratic republic of these United States of America, "the land of the free and the home of the brave"—the result of the devoted labors of that bright-shining galaxy of skeptical heroes, Infidels, if you please, whose names we find not in a Confederate church, but on that already immortalized document, the Declaration of Independence. And of these fifty six names fifty were pronounced skeptics, always including Paine, Jefferson, and Franklin as the prime movers and originators of this world-renowned document; and to whose labors we are especially indebted for the privilege of breathing the free air of republicanism instead of the combined miasmatic upas vapors of monarchy and theology, as heretofore and still extant in the major part of civilization. But Friend Atkinson having lately ventured a little speculation in a scientific investment, in a patent chicken incubator, it is to be hoped he may continue his labors in this direction with a prospect of his final conversion to Rationalism at least. And, on the other hand, there being at present an over supply in the market of theologic incubators, those representing the feathered tribe will undoubtedly be in greater demand.

However, wishing no disparagement to either Atkinson or his especial branch of theology, I may venture to giv them credit for at least one colossal branch of manufacture, in which a million lives and billions of treasure hav been invested, namely, the manufacture of that peculiar garment popularly known by the metaphorical and euphonious name of the "bloody shirt."

Through the demon of war, manufacturing corpses by the hundreds of thousands, saying nothing of the cords of skeletons resting in the prison pens through starvation and stench, our nation shrouded in gloom and mourning, an untold amount of the best blood of the nation on both sides poured out like water, and attempt on the one hand not only to blast the fair fame of the nation, but to blot our government out of existence, and, on the other hand, for the protection and perpetuity of the grandest government on the face of the globe. In this case who are the friends of liberty, fraternity, equality, and the natural rights of men? And who organized this gigantic wholesale slaughter, with the double purpose of blotting out of existence our republican form of government, and on its ruins insure the perpetuity of that "divine institution" which John Wesley denominated the "sum of all villainies?" And now, admitting the charge of six murders in Girard College to be true, it would not be a drop in the bucket as compared with the foul deeds indorsed by T. A. Atkinson, Confederacy & Co. And if he ever puts up prayers for the propagation and success of this class of villainies, or ever threw up his hat at the news of the Andersonville victims, then we may cease to wonder at his venomous attack on Girard College, or any other institution for the benefit of the unfortunate of the human race.

In conclusion, for his future occupation and livelihood, I would advise the chicken incubator, pig-sty manufactory, or almost any domestic calling rather than that of romance and fiction. T. McC.

Karl Heinzen's Book.

E M. Macdonald, Dear Sir: In mine to you of August 24th I mentioned Karl Heinzen's "Woman's Rights," a remarkable book, interesting to read and challenging attentiv study. "Truth About Love" has great strength, but Heinzen is far superior to Croly in analytic sight and re-creativ vigor. Rhetorically it is a masterpiece in literary genius; ethically no other writer, here or abroad, now or in ages past, ever put so much truth touching sex use, beauty, right, duty, pleasure, service within the covers of one book as Heinzen—thanks to Karl Schmemann, its financial godfather, Mrs. Schum, and Mr. Tucker—givs us, in this event, in typed mentality. The book is a worthy prose mate of Walt Whitman's immortal verse, whose ennobling word portraiture of nature Emerson heartily welcomed in 1855, but which war-policy, deceit, and vice-society idiocy depraved him to deplore in 1880. But thanks to everlasting truth Walt does not weaken, and Heinzen, alive all these years, in German, now speaks in plain English undefilable. I wonder that the Pantarch, resident in Boston in 1877, did not happen to meet and know Heinzen; but, as Emerson said of Carlyle in his bleak Scotch home in 1833, our "lone scholar nursed his mighty heart" in solitude, here.

But Heinzen is mistaken in supposing that marriage (which he admits is historically a tragic failure) can ever justify its existence; the avowal of liberty and sincerity are the death of marriage, and the sooner we all attend its funeral the better. The idea that two persons of opposit sex cannot liv together virtuously unless they ask leave of ministers or magistrates! As if priests and politicians hav any virtue to spare! Government lets you into the marriage cage by any easy door, but once in the law-jugglers shake the key in your face, saying: "We hav you now!" To make the tyranny and irresponsible confusion mutual is no remedy; the thing itself is vicious. Free Love says: "Persons capable of making a sex contract are, when wiser by experience, capable of dissolving that contract." How shall two walk together unless they be in agreement? Effort to keep them "one" by legal violence is disastrous folly. Away with your legislativ tinkers! "Shall it be as I wish? It shall be as it is, so and not otherwise!" is the royal voice of love. Marriage, the word and the thing, a defunct delusion, should be put under the sod. Mr. Heinzen does not invoke force, leaves sex relations to adjust themselvs, but he retains a bad word, damaged beyond repair. Mated, not "married," defines the unforced, fruitful, ecstatic unity which he grandly portrays as the emancipated destiny of the sexes.

What Garrison got translated and reprinted from Heinzen in the Liberator mostly was restrictiv talk which repelled me. Luckily for us his soul got into German before the war and now "marches on" in this breezy book. Lucky also that "Leaves of Grass" became the greatest of American poems, before Whitman's genius swooned in armed violence, and vice society vultures hovered over fields of death. Though I did not use the phrase "free love" in "Uncivil Liberty," first published in 1870, the book was intentionally and in fact introductory to "Cupid's Yokes," showing that woman suffrage means the abolition of marriage. The logic of freedom, its redeeming tendency in domestic affairs, is cogently convincing in Heinzen's book, and the women suffragists should put its manly pages under the fair eyes of their bodies militant. Europe comes to us in the nervous rhetoric of Rousseau, and in the deathly discourse of Malthus; the electric genius of the first begets barren idiocy, while war, pestilence, and famin are the restraining angels given sex power by Malthus. What Kent, Andrews, the Lelands—all our free-love philosophers—taught, Heinzen confirms, though his assertion of what women will do in freedom is premature. True freedom allies effects to causes, suffering to error, devolves on persons the necessity of self control; and, in proportion as women are assured intelligent choice, men will be on their good behavior; there will be few children and better, maternity will cease to be a "lost art," as it is now fast becoming among the "upper classes" in cities, and attractiv enterprise will build families worthy of the name.

But what is the use of dogmatizing until we get facts to reason upon? For encouraging effort to learn what are fit words in this great debate I sit here in a stone vault under two years' sentence writing this to you. Intelligence is a "crime;" one records the facts of marriage experience at the risk of fines, imprisonment, social ostracism. Month after month, again and again, my precious children ask, "Mamma, why does not papa come home?" Twenty-six years I and my love mate hav wrought together for race redemption. Fourteen years my devoted family hav suffered assault from Vice Society savagery. It is no holiday task to withstand the persistent raids of legalized barbarism on the sanctity of home and all that makes life desirable. All the guarantees of liberty are struck down. Still, mental liberty and personal integrity are the path upward, and right glad are we that Karl Heinzen's stout form leads that way. Ezra H. Heywood.

The Truth Seeker.

It would be a calamity indeed were The Truth Seeker to fail for lack of patronage. It would be as though the foundations of our cause were wrecked. Other papers that might and would be started could never repair the damage except feebly. There are other papers devoted to the cause, but some are local, others are narrow or limited variously. The Truth Seeker from the first has exhibited a catholicity and charity that should be ours in the higher development of the cause. These traits were those of the noble and illustrious founder, Bennett. He heard all sides and let you decide. Now, there are some wealthy men of our people whose incomes are so great that one day's receipts would, if contributed to sustain the cause, make it certain that our Truth Seeker could not fail. There are hundreds of Liberals who little dream of the straits to which we newspaper men are often put to keep going. A fund from which to pay well a couple of canvassers would insure the prosperity of the paper and its extended circulation if the fund were managed rightly.

It is difficult to get subscribers for our paper. Everybody cannot be approached. Then we hav some illiberal Liberals. I know a man who despises me for believing in a God—that Thought developed thinkers as nature developed matter. So our household is limited and scattered. Come, you rich Freethinker, you truth seeker, for the memory of the martyr who founded it—he was a martyr—think of it, an aged kindly gentleman, a philosopher and philanthropist, dragged from his home and condemned to hard labor, stripped, clad in stripes, shaved, and imprisoned for simply addressing a scientific book now read anywhere before any public when occasion calls for it—for his memory open your purse and your mind to the founding of a trust of some kind for the perpetuation and extension of The Truth Seeker. People are so forgetful, and thus lose their liberties. Bennett's memory will thus liv as a warning of our danger. The persecuting, unconstitutional statutes still exist. So do the human vermin and parasites that liv by them. A hundred years hence, unless Freedom dies, green and glorious will be his memory whose person they desecrated, while men of their names will be petitioning legislation to change them. Mark it, ye unborn who are living then! Holt.

Dr. Barnsfather's Consumption Cure.

I notice you publish Dr. Barnsfather's new cure for consumption. It reminds one of the doctor who knew how to cure fits but nothing else, so he gave his patients fits first and then cured them. Dr. Barnsfather's idea is to giv consumptivs rheumatism or gout first and then the consumption will go and the new disease can be cured afterward. Dear Dr. Barnsfather, you are on the wrong track—trifling with nature—and you will fail. Consumption is a dreadful disease. It must be prevented by educating our youth physically and in hygiene. If cured at all it must be done by hygienic agencies in its early stages. The most successful method so far is that followed by a few sanitarians who keep the patient breathing pure mountain air almost constantly. The weak ones are kept on cots well protected from wind and storm under tents or pavilions all day, and well fed to keep up their strength. Dr. Dettweiller, of Falkenstein, Germany, and a few others cure by this method about twenty-five per cent of their patients, mainly those in the first stages.

I shall giv some account of his proceedings in a work I hope to issue soon on the hygienic treatment of consumption.

There is about as much superstition in medicin as in religion, and The Truth Seeker can do some good by helping to exterminate it.

What I Think.

I shall never hate mine enemy to do an act of injustice to him. Justice, if executed, will punish the evil-doer sufficiently.

My conscience is quite at rest. I offend no God when I denounce the Jewish Bible and deny the divinity of Jesus.

One who is loudest in confessing his faith in God proves to be one who trusts the least in him.

One who joins church because he is afraid of a hell he believes in, is just as bad as one who is profane because he is not afraid of a hell he does not believe in; neither one has the principle of manliness.

The words called "swearing" are conceived and born in the imagination of man, and hav far less meaning than our Yes and No, and the Christian pulpit is responsible for their use and abuse. "God, heaven, devil, and hell" are all without proof of existence. "Jesus" is but a man's name like John and Jacob. Damnation, an expression of a fool, repeated by fools.

Profanity is immoral in and injures self only.
Hypocrisy endangers and injures all others.
Profanity is prohibited by law.
Hypocrisy is encouraged in law.
The profane man givs you a chance.
The hypocrit does not.
The profane man tells you the truth.
The hypocrit belies you.
The profane man givs you your own.
The hypocrit robs you.
The profane man strikes you in the light.
The hypocrit stabs you in the night.
The profane man is shunned and defamed by the church.
The hypocrit is respected and popular with the church.

The profane man belongs to himself, is himself, is what he is.

The hypocrit belongs to the church, as of such is the church, ever pretending to be what it is not.

I believe the Christian religion to be the biggest falsehood that ever was perpetrated upon the credulity of mankind. Jay F. Haldeman.

Col. H. S. Olcott, president-founder of the Theosophical Society, will deliver a public lecture on "Theosophy and H. P. Blavatsky" in Scottish Rite Hall, Madison avenue and 29th street, New York city, on Thursday evening, September 24th, at 8:15. Admission free.

S. P. Putnam's lecture appointments for September and October are as follows: Nanaimo, B. C., September 26th; Wellington, B.C., 27th, 28th; Snohomish, Wash., 30th; West Ferndale, Wash., October 1st, 2d; Portland convention, 3d, 4th, 5th; Grant's Pass, Ore., 7th, 8th; San Francisco, 11th. Will lecture in California through the months of October, November, December, and January, state convention January 29th.

J. G. Hertwig, P. O. box 413, Washington, D. C., intends to lecture during the forthcoming fall and winter on the following subjects: 1. "National Taxation," opposing the present customs and internal revenue systems of the United States and advocating a not graduated income tax in their stead, for raising the revenue necessary for the support of the government. 2. "Free Coinage," advocating free and unlimited coinage, from American silver, of a temporary silver dollar, correct as to its bullion value, and, as soon as it can be accomplished, an international agreement as to a fixed ratio between gold and silver as monetary metals. 3. "Sunday Laws," energetically opposing such laws, as violating the Constitution of the United States, and, in addition, expounding the other demands of Liberalism. He urgently and sincerely solicits engagements for these lectures.

Fifteenth Annual Congress.

The Fifteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the Board of Directors to meet in Philadelphia, on Saturday morning, Oct. 31, 1891, at 10 o'clock, in Industrial Hall, corner of Broad and Wood streets, for the transaction of business, and to continue over Sunday, November 1st, if the Congress shall so determin. No arrangements will be made for reduced railway or hotel rates.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution, rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons of whatever faith to its membership on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in its broadest sense, as applied to the state and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Materialists, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, Progressiv Jews, and Liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and Puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platforms and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as upon the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or woman, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

All who work for religious liberty are welcome to the coming Congress of the American Secular Union in the City of Brotherly Love. R. B. WESTBROOK,
President American Secular Union.

Attest: IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

Philadelphia, Sept. 16, 1891.

Friends, will you send in your contributions to help make this Congress a success? Remember that every dollar invested in this Congress will come back to you with interest, in the surer protection of your freedom from the encroachments of church bigots, as it brings the cause for which we are all working—total separation of church and state—prominently before the people. All contributions, however small, will be gladly received and acknowledged by the secretary, IDA C. CRADDOCK.

About Pamphlets.

From California comes the following:

Please send me . . . some Flag and Pansy leaflets. I think they are splendidly adapted for missionary work. With them conversation on these subjects can be opened with persons that could not hav been approached otherwise.

Referring to a package of assorted pamphlets sent him from this office, the writer says:

The "Church Taxation" and "Bible in Schools" pamphlets I think are the strongest arguments against the encroachments by the church. . . . I hav other pamphlets treating on these subjects, but I like Dr. Westbrook's best, they being written in the most convincing way.

This letter is but one of many which praise the efficiency of the three missionary pamphlets which the American Secular Union has so far been able to issue. The question now before the executiv committee is: Shall we continue to issue and circulate these valuable missionary tracts, or shall we allow them to fall into innocuous desuetude, through lack of funds?

If our old stand-by members will take the trouble to look up the published list of contributions for the past two months, they will find that a large proportion of the money has come in for the Secular Penny Fund and in small amounts. And of these Penny Fund contributions a large proportion comes from an entirely new constituency—the Spiritualistic—who hav been interested in our work through the columns of a leading Spiritualist journal. Spiritualists, as a class, are wide-awake, thoroughly tolerant Liberals, and we find them willing and eager to affiliate with the American Secular Union in its work of state Secularization. We trust that our activ Atheist and Materialist friends to whom this article is especially addressed will show themselvs equally as wide awake to the opportunity now presented for the affiliation of the Liberals of two such widely differing isms, in behalf of the cause so dear to both—the cause of religious liberty.

The past year has seen scores of earnest appeals, through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Freethought, and Secular Thought, for a widespread organization of Liberals against the common foe. The corresponding secretary of the American Secular Union has not been slow to appreciate this need of organization, if we are ever to accomplish anything for state Secularization; and all through the oppressiv heat of the dog-days she has worked away patiently and hopefully, seeking to interest a new constituency in our work. Had our old stand-bys in the cause come forward with their usual annual donations she could hav accomplished far more than she has. As it is, she has been obliged to stint the pamphlets sent out, and, in more than one case, to decline sending them, owing to the necessity of husbanding the little store now on hand in our office. Still, with what resources she has had at her command, she has succeeded in interesting a considerable number of our Spiritualist friends; and she now sets forth this result, imperfect as it necessarily is, in the hopes that those who see this article will come forward and strengthen her hands in the good work of bringing the soldiers in the two diverse camps of Spiritualism and Materialism into one common fighting army—the army of the American Secular Union—pledged to fight for freedom for us all.

The Secular Penny Fund has accomplished much, and it grows from week to week. But it is too early as yet for us to depend upon this as our only financial resource. We need contributions from our wealthy Liberals, in amounts of $10, $25, $50, or $100, if the American Secular Union is to be tided safely over the present fiscal year. Our store of pamphlets, as we hav already said, is quite low, and we hav no money to print a new supply. Moreover, we need money for envelopes, postage, office expenses, etc. It is a shame, a shame, that we hav to turn a deaf ear so often to appeals for pamphlets from lack of funds.

How far that little candle throws his beams,
So shines a good deed in a naughty world.

And so shines the light from every American Secular Union pamphlet that is sent out from this office, illuminating the surrounding night of church bigotry, and preparing the eyes of those sitting in that darkness for that greater light—the full dawn of mental freedom—for whose speedy advent every true Freethinker devoutly yearns and works. Dear friends, will you not one and all do your share in helping the secretary send out not only hundreds, but thousands of these little twinkling lights into the mental darkness which lies like a pall over our fair land?

We trust that this appeal will be promptly responded to by such of our old stand-bys as hav not yet come forward this year to help us. And let no one hesitate because he feels that he cannot giv as much this year as last. If you can giv much, let us hav it; but if "times are hard" with you this year, the columns of the Secular Penny Fund ought to show you, without any argument on our part, what can be accomplished by numerous donations of even small amounts. To print and issue pamphlets money is absolutely necessary; we cannot possibly do it on the wind. Come, friends. Now that the heat and worry of the dog-days are over and we are settling down for winter business, let us hear from you promptly regarding this matter. Let us be able to show at our fall congress that during the past year at least the American Secular Union has not existed in vain. Help the secretary in her attempts to enlist all Liberals under the one standard which we all honor whatever our differing isms—the banner on whose folds is emblazoned the motto, "No union of church and state." IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

A Large Family.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I inclose by postal note twenty-six cents to apply to the Penny Fund. Two cents for myself and wife, five cents for my children who are living, sixteen cents for my grandchildren, and three cents for my great-grandchildren. Quite a family, but I expect to be beaten by others in number. WM. HART.

WE will furnish free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. A Freethinker of good address, man or woman, out of work, could make good salary selling this book in any town of fairly Liberal inhabitants.

My Lecture Trip.

Leaving New York on Saturday evening by the Western express, I reached Pittsburgh on Sunday morning after a tedious ride of thirteen and a half hours. When daylight broke and I was aroused from my sleep, I found myself just a few miles east of Johnstown, Pa., where the noted flood occurred a few years ago. As I passed this picturesque little town I thought of the awful disaster that befell it on that fateful day, and my mind naturally wandered to the poor sufferers that were overcome by it, and at once the question arose within my mind, "Where was the deity at the time these human beings were struggling for life in that seething torrent of waters?" And a small voice within me seemed to say, "Up in the gallery with the rest of the Gods, instead of taking his part in the great drama of life."

En route I passed several small villages whose inhabitants were utilizing the bounties with which nature had provided them, and were lighting their streets with the natural gas, which is very beautiful in these districts. I mention this because it was a curiosity to me, coming as I did direct from the great metropolis. Reaching Pittsburgh on Sunday morning I soon found myself with Liberal friends, and they welcomed me very cordially indeed. My lecture, the first on my trip, was delivered before a very fair audience, considering that this was the first meeting of the season. There were a goodly sprinkling of ladies, for which I congratulate the Pittsburgh Secularists, for when our friends can realize that these are the mothers of the great human family they will then begin to understand how necessary it is to make an effort to secure their attendance at our meetings—and above all, when we find ourselvs confronted with the fact that women form nearly, if not all, of the church membership. I made many new friends in Pittsburgh, and was pleased to meet with such doughty old champions of Freethought as Roman Staley, Harry Hoover, W. Barker, and others. My visit to the smoky city will ever be associated with pleasant memories. I resumed my journey westward on Tuesday morning en route for Millersburg, O., my next place to lecture. Owing to a delay of four and a half hours, it was midnight ere I reached my destination. Though late was the hour, I was met at the depot by friends who immediately took me to comfortable quarters at the Central Hotel, kept by a J. A. Gouser, a jolly old Freethinker. Millersburg is a pretty little agricultural district of two thousand inhabitants, and has a large Liberal element, but so cruel is the vengeance of society upon those who refuse to worship its fetiches that many feel compelled in a great measure to restrain their true feelings, and as everywhere else I found an honest and faithful few who would willingly move heaven and earth to effect a spirited advocacy of their principles. One of these I must mention, J. Chevellard; also E. F. Besancon, Schilling, and J. A. Gouser. Millersburg could accomplish good Liberal work had it but one good local speaker who would be capable of entertaining an audience. I delivered two lectures here, which were fairly well attended considering the size of the town and that it has seven churches to support. Personally I was well pleased with my efforts here. On again by the first train Saturday morning for Shreve, my next halting-ground. I was at once taken charge of by V. D. Manson, and as my lecture did not take place until the evening, I spent the afternoon visiting my flock; but alas, there was no cold chicken. Shreve is another of those agricultural towns for which this part of Ohio is noted. It has a population just one-half of Millersburg, but has a larger and more courageous Liberal element. My lectures had been well advertised; although, with that truly Christian method of argument, our posters were torn down as fast as they were put up. The local friends next resorted to dodgers as a mode of advertisment, with which the town was abundantly supplied, the general result of which was a large and enthusiastic audience, who listened very attentivly to what was said; and thus my first lecture in Shreve met with unbounded success. The local parsons had been cordially invited to attend the lectures. They accepted and promised sure to be there; but promises were all we got, for they made themselvs conspicuous by their absence. Sunday I was down for two lectures at 3 and 7 P.M. respectivly. They were well attended, the hall being crowded to excess at night. I am pleased to say that Shreve is pretty free from being priest-ridden, thanks to the praiseworthy zeal of V. D. Manson and his co-workers. All hail to Shreve for its efforts toward Secularism. I shall expect to hear great things from here yet. They hav splendid opportunities before them. These well utilized will place them on a sure foundation for our future. Monday morning I was driven to Nashville, a distance of seven miles from here, in a buggy, across country, where I shall deliver two lectures on Monday and Tuesday evenings respectivly. I am still open for engagements to lecture or debate during the latter part of October and November. Friends in Iowa and Nebraska desiring my services are requested to address me in care of E. A. Stevens, 498 West Madison street, Chicago.

Lecture Notes.

I am on the eve of my departure from this little town of Du Bois for Pittsburgh. I hav given the first Freethought lectures here to rather indifferent audiences. The place boasts of eleven churches, and a population of six thousand heads (no souls). The church controls everything. A few Liberals some months ago concluded to hav a number of Radical lectures and Mr. W. I. Kirk wrote to me when I was on my way to New York, but I could not then make arrangements, but promised to come here in September. Although there are many preachers here, and they were all invited to attend the lectures, I think there was only one who put in an appearance, and he did not attempt to make any reply to my lectures, although a cordial invitation was given for the clergy to reply.

I was very sumptuously entertained by the veteran Freethinker James Hine and his family. Mr. Hine is an outspoken Liberal, and is known all over the country as such. He gave the use of his Opera House free, and made every effort to make the lectures a success. I met a number of good Liberals who not only greeted me with a hearty handshake but also went down into their pockets for the material comfort that sends the lecturer on to the next place. Among the number of these are, Messrs. W. I. Kirk, James Hine, A. Miller, Thos. Borings, Joseph Kirk, Herman Shafer, Dr. New, and several others whose names I cannot now recall.

I made an urgent appeal for subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, but with not much success. It is true that both these grand papers are taken here, but there are quite a few men who are able to take one or both papers who take neither of them, and yet claim to be Freethinkers of the first water. I think that one of the greatest reforms needed just now is to hav our rank and file Liberals turn over a new leaf and subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER* or Investigator.

Josephus and the Old Testament.

The article of J. E. Remsburg, in a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, on the death of Jehosaphat, is good, yet it is but one of the many arguments adducible to show conclusivly that the scripture record is not perfect or reliable, and therefore not divine revelation. Whatever hypotheses Christians may invent to satisfy the demands of reason for precision and consistency, are wholly gratuitous, out of order, and as the lawyer would object, "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." There is no relation between the finite and the infinit that can justify any other conclusion. Whether our revelation be perfect or imperfect is beyond the province of the human mind to judge. Whether it be comprehensible or incomprehensible, whether it be the power of God unto salvation or a stumbling-block, it must remain immutably the same, even as the revelator has said, "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book. And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life." Nor is the idea of human interpretation at all admissible. If it is not within itself an irrefragable power of conviction, it is no revelation. The saying of Christ, "Ye do err not knowing the scriptures," negativs the assumption of a divine revelation as surely as the dependent is a condition below the absolute. Belief is entirely another matter, without authority to dictate what is fact, and without prerogativs beyond an equality with unbelief.

In Mr. Remsburg's article he attests the fact that Christians esteem Josephus one of their important authorities, and shows that the time given by him from the death of Ahab to the capture of the ten tribes "forbids the idea of any interregnum." This happens to be true in this instance and suits his purpose; but in comparing Josephus with scripture chronology from the accession of Jeroboam to the death of Ahab we do not find the same agreement. He says that from the death of David to the death of Ahab was 163 years, from which if we subtract the reign of Solomon, 40 years, we get 123 years from Solomon to the death of Ahab, but from the beginning of Jeroboam's reign to the death of Ahab by the scripture record was but 84 years. I am aware that Josephus says (Ant., bk. viii, chap. 7, sec. 8) that Solomon reigned 80 years, which, if true, would corroborate the scripture time; but 1 Kings xi, 42, and 2 Chron. ix, 30, say that Solomon's reign was 40 years; so it makes no difference to me which horn of the dilemma is taken, as my purpose is to show that Josephus not only does not corroborate the scriptures, but also that he was but a very indifferent believer in the Bible. He further says that Solomon was 94 years old when he died, while scripture authority givs us but 58 as his age at death. We also infer from Josephus that the sins of Solomon began early in his reign, while our priests tell us differently, notwithstanding the fact that one of his first acts was to violate that sacred law by marrying the daughter of Pharaoh an Egyptian.

Josephus says that Joash, king of Israel, "was a good man, and in his disposition was not at all like his father;" while scripture says of him, "And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord; he departed not from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel sin; but he walked therein." The commentator, who acknowledges this "direct contradiction," himself flies into the face of scripture with an attempted explanation, when he says, "It is most likely that he was at first a wicked king, and afterward was reclaimed, and became a good one." Such utter straits are Christians driven to whenever it is necessary to deal with the testimonies of the world. Josephus says the number of pedigreed Jews over twelve years old that returned from Babylon to Jerusalem under the proclamation of Cyrus was 4 628,000; the Bible says it was but 42 360. Josephus claims that in the contract between Saul and David for Michal, the consideration was 600 heads of the Philistines instead of 100 foreskins. Josephus positivly asserts that those midwives were Egyptians instead of Israelites, as our Bible givs it, upon which the reverend commentator says, "Which is very probable," and then adds, "Josephus must hav had much completer copies of the Pentateuch" than ours to write from.

Great heavens! Is it possible that we hav gotten the wrong Bible? and the one withal that has the least show of probability?

In Josephus against Apion we find him in a rage that runs away with his discretion. The bone of contention is mostly over the question as to who the Israelites were; and the frantic criminations and pueril retorts of Josephus are not at all in keeping with the cool candor and gentlemanly demeanor that should characterize the writing of one who feels secure in the integrity of his cause and incontrovertible arguments. He charges against Manetho that his Amenophis is utterly a fictitious king, and tries thus to brush away the groundwork of a story that is far from creditable to the Jews. To read this with implicit confidence in what Josephus says one would be shocked at the impudence and lying resorted to by both Apion and Manetho; but a little investigation compels the more conservativ and reasonable man to withhold his censure; for lo! in the encyclopedia we find three Egyptian kings of that very name; and again in Rollin we find that one of these was the Pharaoh of the exodus, which agrees with Manetho, the Egyptian historian.

In the days of Josephus, perhaps more than now, there was policy in piety, and in his case I am inclined to think the policy part of his religion largely predominated, however pious he may be said to hav been. Being a Jew of the proudest sect, he was ambitious to make the record of Israel a matter of honor and applause throughout the history of his race, and scrupled not at appropriating any facts that could be converted to this end and ignoring every bemeaning feature that could be covered up or beaten down. Josephus was not careful as to what degree of violence he did the Mosaic narrativ of the sojourn in Egypt and the exodus, in assuming that the Hykshos were the Israelites. To this end he was willing to sacrifice every miracle of Moses if need be and every providence of God that could not be reconciled to his theory. In confirmation of such a view let me ask what possible motiv, other than to prepare the way for identically such a necessity, could ever hav prompted those dubious passages that for place and application are exactly where they should be. To wit: At the end of Bk. 3 he says, "But as to these matters let everyone take them as he sees fit." Bk. 4, chap. 6, sec. 13, "But let everyone think of these matters as he pleases;" and at the end of Bk. 10, "Now as to myself, I hav so described these matters as I hav found them and read them; but if anyone is inclined to another opinion about them, let him enjoy his different sentiments without any blame from me." Surely an incorruptible honesty and an unshaken sincerity never could be suspected of such criminal liberality under a regime so exact and exacting as that attributed to the Jews.

There are other such passages—one following the Red sea narrativ, and another after the episode of Jonah and the whale. Some encyclopedias state that these two miracles were not believed by Josephus. Upon whatever grounds such claim is based, they are cumulativ evidence in favor of my position.

I cannot understand how the Antiquities of Josephus can be esteemed valuable testimony in behalf of Christianity.

We hope that whenever a Freethinker sees an article in his local paper in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays he will mark it and send a copy to Benjamin Butterworth, secretary Board of Directors of World's Fair, Rand McNally building, Chicago, Ill., and to John T. Dickinson, secretary National Commission of World's Fair, and the same address. Let us make a vigorous and persistent fight in this matter. Our efforts must not slacken till the final decision is made, which may not be till 1893.

Notice Regarding the Secular Union Congress.

Now that the Congress of the American Secular Union is called Mr. W. S. Andres desires us to say that some time during the meeting he will present for adoption a general revision of its constitution. We understand that Mr. John R. Charlesworth also will, if his lecturing engagements permit him to be there, present some amendments to the organic basis of the Union.

From the tone of the Call of the Board of Directors we judge that they expect the business to be transacted quickly. This is well, yet the delegates might well expend some time in discussing how best to further the objects of the Union by some practical work. There is less need of changing the constitution than there is of doing something under the old one.

We hope that the Liberals of the country will numerously attend the Congress. These annual meetings are pleasant affairs and many lasting friendships hav been formed at them. It is good to get together, even if we do differ on almost every question brought up.

Work to Do.

The question of Sunday opening or closing of the World's Fair will be settled by the local board of directors conjointly with the federal commission. This latter body will, we believe, unless death intervenes, be the same in 1893 as now; but the local board is elected each year, and consequently there are two elections to take place before the board which has the final power is chosen. Any action taken now might be reversed then.

It is probable that the two bodies will defer action on this matter until the year of the opening. It is therefore of great importance that a constant pressure be brought to bear upon the various local boards and especially upon the federal commission, that when the time comes for deciding there shall be no doubt as to what is the real public sentiment in the matter.

The American Sabbath Union, aided by the clergy of the country, will exert such pressure in favor of Sunday closing. The Liberals of the country should be sure that the Sabbath Union is opposed effectivly.

Christianity's Theory of Insani

This news comes from England:

"Since the discussion among the doctors upon the value of music as an agent for convalescence, a guild of Saint Cecilia has been established in London, with the aim of training musicians to soothe a patient's nerves with music, under the direction of the physicians. Every member must possess a sweet, gentle voice and delicate execution."

In Mohammedan countries music was employed as a remedial agent in mental diseases many centuries ago. Christian lands recently, upon casting away the cures of insanity by supernatural means, adopted that instrumentality as a valuable auxiliary. Now, we see, they are extending its application to general cases of nervous irritation. In treatment of this class of troubles Christianity has an infamous record, while Mohammedanism boasts of a career calling for the highest praise. In the seventh century Caliph Omar protected and encouraged the scientific investigation of insanity by Paul of Ægina. Since then the Mohammedans hav uniformly treated mental disease with comfortable and commodious quarters and gentle care, and hav secured a very considerable number of cures. In the fifteenth century visitors to Moslem lands returned with suggestions of improvement which in Spain and Italy produced temporarily the only amelioration in Christian handling of mental disease that occurred during ten centuries. Even in 1789 John Howard found in Constantinople a better insane asylum than the great St. Luke's Hospital in London. The Christian method in treatment of mental derangement was so atrocious as to deserve a description of some length.

The medical investigators of Greece and Rome, pursuing natural lines of inquiry and unblinded by supernaturalism, early obtained correct notions of mental alienation. In the fifth century before Christ Hippocrates asserted madness to be simply disease of the brain. In the first century after Christ, Aretæus developed this idea by skilful investigations. In the second century Soranus and Galen made further advances. In the third century Celius Aurelianus achieved yet nobler results. He laid down that the only line of treatment on which cures could be expected must be gentle and kind. In the sixth century Alexander of Tralles presented still more fruitful researches, and taught how to deal with melancholia.

But with the development of Christianity all these wise teachings were relegated to obscurity, all these lines of progress were checked. A notion that madness is possession by Satan or his devils became an undoubted church doctrin. In the apostolic times no belief had been more faithfully received. The early fathers and doctors universally accepted it. Michael Psellus in his "Treatis on Demons" presents two main postulates—first, that we know from scripture that demons suffer by material fire and brimstone, and hence they must hav material bodies; second, that since all demons are by nature cold, they gladly seek to warm their material bodies by entering the warm flesh of men. Scripture was with all writers the great arsenal of weapons in defense of the theory. Citations were made of such cases in the Old Testament as the evil spirit in Saul, and in the New Testament as the numerous castings out of devils. Among the many texts the ones most often adduced were Matt. viii, 28, and Luke x, 17. For the use of fetiches in driving out evil spirits, sanction was shown in the account of the cures worked by touching the garments of St. Paul, in Acts xix, 12. It was held that devils entered into beasts as well as into men; and objectors were met with references to the entrance of Satan into the serpent in Eden, to the transformation of Nebuchadnezzar, and to the casting of devils into swine by Christ.

For a time the chief evil flowing from this belief was the perversion of investigation from the true source of insanity. Nothing was done in the way of positiv injury to the sufferer. The treatment consisted of holy water, sanctified ointments, the breath or spittle of a priest, the touching of relics, visits to holy places, and mild forms of exorcism. Before long, however, this system was changed. There grew up a belief that Satan could be driven from men's bodies by cruelties to the sufferers. It was thought that cruelty to madmen was punishment of the devil within them. Continual reference to the sacred writings supported the doctrin that most of the insane were possessed by the devil and many were in league with him, hence tormenting lunatics was merely torturing Satan or his confederates. The admonitions to gentle treatment of the great pagan and Moslem physicians were forgotten. Often the afflicted person was first scourged, that the evil one might be whipped out of him; and if this failed to eject the diabolical tenant the most dreadful forms of torture were brought into requisition. The few noble physicians who dared to protest were silenced, and the treatment of the insane fell altogether into the hands of the ecclesiastic, the jailer, the torturer, and the executioner.

One form of insanity received especial severity of dealing. This was that species of delusion in which the affected individual believes himself a divine person. In occasional cases such persons luckily chanced to fall heir to reverent usage—as we now see some self-elevated Christs worshiped while others are locked up. Sometimes these fortunate persons had sainthood conferred upon them; instances are St. Francis of Assisi and St. Catherine in Italy, St. Bridget in Sweden, St. Theresa in Spain, St. Mary Alacoque in France, and Louise Lateau in France. These worthies were all lunatics, and canonized because their lunacy took the shape of imaginations that they were holy creatures. In general, however, persons under this species of delusion were hardly dealt with, and often burnt alive.

Quaint details of the exorcisms hav been raked out of the must of the past by Ex-President White of Cornell University. He relates that "a fundamental premis in the fully developed exorcism was that, according to sacred scripture, a main characteristic of Satan is pride. Pride led him to rebel—for pride he was cast down; therefore the first thing to do, in driving him out of a lunatic, was to strike a fatal blow at this pride—to disgust him.

"This theory was carried out logically, to the letter. The treatises on the subject simply astound one by their wealth of epithets—blasphemous and obscene—which it was allowable for the exorcist to use in casting out devils. The 'Treasury of Exorcisms' contains hundreds of pages packed with the vilest epithets which the worst imagination could invent for the purpose of overwhelming the indwelling Satan.

"Some of these decent enough to be printed in these degenerate days are as follows:

"'Thou lustful and stupid one, . . . thou lean sow, famin-stricken and most impure, . . . thou wrinkled beast, thou mangy beast, thou beast of all beasts the most beastly, . . . thou mad spirit, . . . thou bestial and foolish drunkard, . . . most greedy wolf, ... most abominable whisperer, . . . thou sooty spirit from Tartarus! . . . I cast thee down, O Tartarean boor, into the infernal kitchen! Loathsome cobbler, . . . dingy collier, . . . filthy sow (scrofa stercorata), . . . perfidious boar, . . . envious crocodile, . . . malodorous drudge, . . . wounded basilisk . . . rust-colored asp, . . . swollen toad, . . . entangled spider, . . . lousy wineherd (porcarie pedicose), . . . lowest of the low, . . . cudgeled ass,' etc.

"But, in addition to this attempt to disgust Satan's pride with blackguardism, there was another to scare him with tremendous words. For this purpose, great, sounding names, from Hebrew and Greek, of the deity were imported, such as Acharon, Eheye, Schemhamphora, Tetragrammaton, Homousion, Ho Theos, Athanatos, Ischiros, Æcodes, and the like.

"Efforts were also made to drive him out with filthy and rank-smelling drugs; and, among those which can be mentioned in a printed article, we may name asafetida, sulphur, squills, etc., which were to be burnt under his nose.

"Still further to plague him, pictures of the devil were to be spat upon, trampled under foot by people of low condition, and sprinkled with foul compounds. . . .

"Besides these, were long litanies of billingsgate, cursing, and threatening. One of these 'scourging' exorcisms runs partly as follows:

"'May Agyos strike thee, as he did Egypt, with frogs! . . . May all the devils that are thy foes rush forth upon thee, and drag thee down to hell! . . . May . . . Tetragrammaton . . . drive thee forth and stone thee, as Israel did to Achan! . . . May the holy one trample on thee and hang thee up in an infernal fork, as was done to the five kings of the Amorites! . . . May God set a nail to your skull, and pound it in with a hammer, as Jael did unto Sisera! . . . May . . . Sother . . . break thy head and cut off thy hands, as was done to the cursed dragon! May God hang thee in a hellish yoke, as seven men were hung by the sons of Saul!'

"And so on, through five pages of close-printed Latin curses.

"Occasionally the demon is reasoned with, as follows:

"'O obstinate fly, accursed fly! . . . why did you stop and hold back when you know that your strength is lost on Christ? For it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks; and, verily, the longer it takes you to go, the worse it will go with you. Begone, then, take flight, thou venomous hisser, thou lying worm, thou begetter of vipers.'"

The cruelty of the treatment had its inevitable effect in aggravation of the complaint, while the fanaticism and wildnesses attending it vastly increased the number of the affected. Terror of Satan and satanic seizure spread mental disorder, until we hear of convents, villages, and large tracts ravaged by epidemics of diabolical possession. One mode of cure particularly augmented the ranks of the afflicted, and this was the treatment by great religious processions. Troops of men and women, crying, howling, imploring saints, beating themselvs with whips, visited sacred shrines, images, and places, in the hope of driving off the infernal legions. The effect was the seizure of added numbers by mental derangement. Monasteries and convents, particularly the latter, were especial hot-beds of brain disease.

At the division of Christendom into two churches, each vied with the other in cure by exorcism. The Catholic used holy water and consecrated wax, while the Protestant employed scriptural texts and vehement prayer. If a patient had been treated by the rival sect, the one into whose hands he next fell thought him needing holy offices worse than before; for each party regarded the opposit as a tool of Satan, and by Christ they had been informed that "no man can by Beelzebub cast out devils." Each church grounded its claims to divinity on the efficacy of its exorcisms. The Jesuits of Vienna in 1583 vaunted that they had cast out twelve thousand six hundred and fifty-two living devils. Ecclesiastical annals abound in boasts of these "mighty works." The exorcism of a bishop of Beauvais was so powerful that five devils surrendered a victim and signed a document promising good behavior.

As the throes of the Protestant Reformation enhanced in fierceness, insanity was spread by the terrible doubts besetting men's minds that possibly they had made the fatal choice of a creed which was not true and that they would therefore be eternally tormented. In addition, mental aberration began to spring, Dr. White remarks, "among young women exposed to sundry fanatical Protestant preachers: insanity, both temporary and permanent, was thus frequently developed among the Huguenots of France, and has been thus produced in America, from the days of the Salem persecution down to the camp meetings of the present time."

Presently the numbers of the deranged were so great that they could not be accounted for by the malice of Satan working unassisted; they were referred to the growing numbers of "those human allies of Satan known as witches." Thenceforward a dreadful persecution of witches raged. Congenital weak-mindedness, hysteria, or madness served whenever required to convict some neighbor of witchcraft. The dreadfulness of the condition into which society was thrown swelled the numbers of the mad.

A high modern authority states that, though the temporary stage of civilization into which we hav so hurriedly rushed and to which we hav not grown accustomed increases insanity, the number affected at present is far below that of the Catholic and the Reformation periods.

It will be remembered that during the Reformation the faith in a personal devil became, under the influences of Luther and Calvin, enhanced rather than weakened. Luther affirmed that insanity is caused by Satan, and exorcised the afflicted. Indeed, according to Luther, "Satan produces all the maladies that afflict mankind." He had such a horror of idiocy, as of satanic origin, that on one occasion he recommended the killing of an idiotic child as the devil's offspring. His favorit sanctioning text was that containing the query of St. Paul as to the bewitching of the Galatians. Calvin held with Luther, and enforced his belief with greater harshness. Wesley insisted, on the authority of the Old Testament, that bodily diseases are sometimes caused by devils, and, upon the authority of the New Testament, that the gods of the heathen were demons; he believed that dreams, while in some cases caused by bodily conditions and passions, are shown by scripture to be also caused by occult powers of evil; he cites a physician to prove that "most lunatics are really demoniacs." In his great sermon on "Evil Angels," he dwells upon this point especially; resists the idea that "possession" may be epilepsy, even though ordinary symptoms of epilepsy be present; protests against "giving up to Infidels such proofs of an invisible world as are to be found in diabolic possession," and evidently believes that some who hav been made hysterical by his own preaching are "possessed of Satan."

At the revival of pagan learning and the spread of modern information a long and bitter contest waged between the clergy on one hand and medical men and thinkers on the other. At first the latter were forced to express themselvs covertly or mildly. Bekker for advancing a text from 2 Peter showing that the devils had been confined by God and so could not be on earth doing the imputed work, narrowly escaped death. Countless other outspeakers lost their lives. But finally unmistakable signs of a new era were shown. In 1672 sixteen men confined at Rouen to be burnt as sorcerers were spared and ordered treated for madness. In 1725 a French court physician, St. Andre, published a work declaring "demoniacal possession" to be lunacy. In 1768 the Parliament of Paris directed that possessed persons be considered simply insane. Germany and England followed in the same path. Yet insane asylums long remained cruel places where sufferers were chained in darkness and treated with whippings and starvation. Generations elapsed before insane patients were treated with the air, light, liberty, exercise, and encouragement of mental action which alone can relieve, and which were practiced by pagans before, and by Mohammedans during, the horrible reign of Christianity.

What Roman Catholics Believe.

Occasionally a Roman Catholic will be heard, in conversation with an opponent of his church, declaring that that body does not teach him that all non-Catholics are damned. It is manifest that the Catholic thus speaking is ashamed of the infamous doctrin. And there are now floating about in a few Catholic quarters loose notions of those palliations obtaining in the Protestant world—pretenses of probation after death and the like. One seeker of information on the actual Catholic belief asks the New York Sun three questions:

"1. Does the church of Rome hold that its members to be saved must believe all the doctrins of the church?"

"Yes," replies the journal.

"2. Is it one of these doctrins that none who denies the supremacy of the pope of Rome can be saved?"

The reply is Yes; and there is cited from a catechism this: "All those who wish to be saved must die united to the [Roman] Catholic church, for out of her there is no salvation."

"3. Does, then, a Roman Catholic's salvation depend, among other things, on his belief in the damnation of the several hundred millions of Christians who are without the Roman church?"

The querier receives the cheerful intelligence: "Yes; he must believe whatever the church of Rome up to 1870 declared was its doctrin, and whatever the pope, since 1870, when he was declared infallible, has declared to be its doctrin. Said Pope Pius IX: 'It is indeed of faith that no one can be saved outside the apostolic Roman church; that this church is the one ark of salvation; that he who has not entered it will perish in the deluge.'" Roman Catholics are irrevocably committed to this doctrin. Let none of the explainers-away who will some day be as numerous in the Catholic church as now in the Protestant, deny or garble it unchallenged.

And think what results in disposition to persecute must spring from the undoubting faith in this tenet of many millions of believers.

And fancy the miserable fatuity and abominable presumption which would insult, tyrannize, and damn every one of us who does not venerate each word of that heartless and dishonest Romish rogue Mr. Pecci which has been uttered "since 1870, when he was declared infallible."

Consequences of the Clergy's Teachings.

The Chicago Times judiciously remarks:

"There are two sides to the question whether the Russian Jews now flocking in great numbers to this country in consequence of the czar's edict of expulsion should be denied admission to the United States under the law barring pauper immigrants. That they are paupers in the literal sense of the word is not to be denied. Driven from their homes by a cruel order that refused them time to realize upon the property they might hav, forced to travel hurriedly with no time for economies, plundered by rapacious guards, and obliged to throw away much of their household goods for lack of transportation facilities, they hav reached our shores literally stripped of their belongings. Yet few of these unhappy people are paupers from choice or because of their own fault. They are not impoverished because of habits of indolence or thriftlessness. In no sense do they belong to the class against which the law in its spirit seeks to protect this country."

But we hav not the slightest expectation that any discrimination in favor of these unfortunates will be made. It is, however, the religion which this nation supports—indeed, enforces—that is the cause of their misery. One unexperienced in the impossibility of getting blood out of a stone might look to the Christian denominations of America for some action palliativ of the sufferings arising from the logical carrying out of the dicta of their religion. Why, it might be asked, do not the clergy at least make themselvs notable in compunction at this extreme application of the principles which they hav been recommending? Why do they not point out that such a consequence must inevitably attend zeal for their tenets when carried beyond a certain degree? Why do they not after this fearful instance content themselvs with a moderate devoutness in their hearers, instead of continuing as heretofore to demand a sweeping conversion of this whole nation to an ardent devotion which would produce persecutions of heretics as dreadful as the Russian? But these questions would be asked only by one deluded by the ecclesiastics into a belief that their desires are really for the good of mankind. Such is not the case. Their desires are to secure power for themselvs—luxury, mastership, ability to shut the hateful contradictory mouth—and to do this they would hesitate at no means. To do this they would willingly see not only all the Jews in the United States plundered and expelled along with those of Russia, but every heretic on the rack and a witch-fire blazing on every hill.

Editorial Notes.

COMMENDING the destruction of the manuscript of the Burton translation of the "Arabian Nights," a writer, evidently Christian, says: "The reading of lewd books is simply giving nutriment to a passion to which human nature is heir and which will finally take possession of the one who indulges in it." On the margin of the Journal, which bears the name of D P. Greely as subscriber, we find this pertinent query: "How about the Bible and the 'Crimes of Preachers'?" It is a question which must occur to many.

A PIOUS brother has painted the board walk at Ocean Grove, N. J., with startling suggestions to the promenading sinner. At the same time an economical employee of the Camp Meeting Association has mended holes in the planks with the covers of boxes that once contained supplies of a fashionable brand of soap. Consequently the pedestrian reads at his feet in rapid succession the legends, "Repent," "Fear God," and "Use Hippopotamus Soap." This has shocked divers pietistic piddlers. Yet the Pentateuch consists of a quite similar mishmash of intermingled conjurings to godliness and exhortations to patronize the only original brand of hair oil, deal only at specified sacerdotal custom clothiers, and follow none but certain modes in bath, cuisine, and other departments whose regulation has seemed to some but difficultly compatible with divine dignity.

DR BARNSFATHER, the discoverer of the latest consumption cure, sailed for Glasgow, Scotland, on the 19th. He will endeavor to prove to the world that he has the cure of consumption by injection of rheumatic serum into the bodies of patients who are consumptivs. He has given up a lucrativ business to proclaim to the world a new cure of that terrible scourge, consumption, and he hopes the medical profession will bear with him until he can prove to them the truth of his statements. As far as he has experimented with the serum he is perfectly delighted with the results and the patients are all enthusiastic as to the treatment. He has injected quite a number lately, the only trouble being the paucity of rheumatic material necessary for a doctor in private practice to use for the numbers of consumptiv patients who wish treatment, but he will get that overcome by a sufficient supply from a large hospital. Still the facts remain the same. He will spend the winter in his investigations for the benefit of science, but more especially for the relief of the poor consumptiv. For he present he is after details, and they can only be worked out in the wards of a large hospital. He is satisfied that he has the remedy, but he must convince the great army of doctors that he is right, then when they get the details the saving of lives will begin and the reign of the terrible scourge of consumption must end.

WE will furnish free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. A Freethinker of good address, man or woman, out of work, could make good salary selling this book in any town of fairly Liberal inhabitants.

Letters from Friends.

To New Mexican Liberals.

FITCHVILLE, O., Sept. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I do not know any better way to find out what I want to know than to write to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am a young man of nineteen summers; hav tried to get along in this Christian community until I am tired. I want to go South, and if there is any person in the Pecas valley, N. M., especially in Eddy, N. M., that should happen to read this, I want to correspond with him.

J. W. MARTIN.

Burr or Remsburg to the Front.

WORCESTER, MASS., Sept. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The National Tribune, Washington, D. C., is publishing a series on the history and influence of the Christian denominations in the United States by prominent "divines." The first, on the Episcopal church, by the bishop of Maryland, claimed Washington, Franklin, Randolph, Morris, Henry, and Jackson as Episcopals. I wish that Burr or Remsburg would supply that or some other paper with an article on Freethought and its work in the United States and tell what these men were. J. P. GUILD.

Serious Considerations.

NAUVOO, ILL., Aug. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The history of the world, progress, intelligence, and civilization are all against Roman Catholicism—Jesuitism and the "bett schwesters." I hold that universal education is the safety of our republic. The Roman Catholic church has always been the enemy of progress and of our public free schools. I am in favor of any party that will beat Roman Catholicism in this country, as I consider Jesuitism the most dangerous secret organization that now threatens the republic and our free American institutions. My motto is, "Eternal separation of church and state," and that the state shall rule and not Rome.

GEORGE ALEX. RITTER.

One Gleam from a Benighted Land.

LONDON, ONT., Aug. 31, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is all right. Just hit superstition hard in John Peck style. I inclose money for subscription, and one copy of the Bible Pictures when you hav them finished, and the ANNUALS for 1890 and 1891. London is a very pious place—thirty-five thousand inhabitants, a church on every corner almost, no street-cars on Sunday. They would not even allow boats to run down to the cemetery Sunday. Nevertheless, there has been more executions here than in any place I know of its size; and they all went to heaven, so they said. Amen. VESTER HUMANITAS.

Likes Rattling Saints' Bones Over the Stones.

BEE, NEB., Aug. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It does one good to hav THE TRUTH SEEKER haul up the old saints and rattle their bones over the stones of modern science. Their erosion is approaching completion, and faith is declining to a sedimentary formation in the lower plains of human civilization, and even there its eruption follows intelligent instruction, and like the mist on the mountain-top vanishes before the sunlight of reason. Here is my hand to Professor Heston, the pedagog to bring priests to reason, and show the truth that superstition leads the way to human treason. Long may he liv and furnish with Hestonic flourish the cyclonic cartoons for THE TRUTH SEEKER. CALVIN J. WRIGHT.

Can See Pious Humbug as Quick as a "Yank."

DAISY, TENN., Sept. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am a reader of your valuable paper, which I buy of Mr. Henderson, of Chattanooga. My work takes me around over the country a great deal and gives me a good chance to study the people. I find Freethought has a far better hold here than many writers from this section would lead one to believe. The people are shrewd and can see a humbug as quick as any "Yank," but they do not talk much about humbug preachers unless they are sure of a sympathetic listener. It is mere politeness that keeps them from it, however. They do not like to hurt any church-member's feelings by speaking too freely in their presence. I see but little Freethought literature, however, and would be glad to distribute anything in that line you could send. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER an increased circulation, I remain,

Yours for free speech, WM. GREENE

Interesting Letter from an Ex-Bondwoman.

HARRIMAN, TENN., Aug. 31, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Through the kindness of a few stanch friends I hav been the recipient from time to time of some copies of your valuable paper, as well as of other Liberal periodicals which I greatly appreciate. And that I am not a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER is a result of very straitened circumstances produced by intemperance in my home. It is a source of regret to me that the Liberal papers generally do not espouse the cause of Prohibition, which principle is conceded to be right even by its political opponents. I should wish to see the upbuilders of a freer, better humanity embrace in their might this great social and political factor, which the God-fearing ones are even now bringing under religious control. Politics must be purified and the home protected, and therefore—Freethinkers to the rescue!

I hav made bold to inclose for your inspection my first verses on my emancipation from Romish thralldom, and if you deem them worthy of a niche in THE TRUTH SEEKER I may be further emboldened to send you a description of a journey from Rome to reason.

Wishing the Liberal cause promotion in Prohibition, thereby to oust "fanatic cranks," I hav the pleasure of remaining, An ex-bondwoman of Rome,

ELIZABETH LENAGHEN.

HUMANITY'S GOD.

Affectionately inscribed to Ginevra.

You ask me to portray my idea of God.
Well, my friend, for your sake I will try,
Though the picture, I fear me, I draw, will ill suit
The Christianized critical eye.

The God of the orthodox sects sits enthroned
In a palace of jasper and gold,
Dealing out in his infinit justice, so called,
Maledictions and ruin untold.

Such a God has been feared through the ages
From Adam's dire fall to the flood.
Sodom's destruction and Babylon's doom
Were necessities to make men good.

As time e'er rolled on and nations grew strong,
Passions waxed fiercer and high—
In the midst of the battle-field's thunder and roar
"God wills it!" resounded the cry.

Look through the Dark Ages, when free speech was dumb
And the masses were forced to obey
The mandates of tyrants in clerical form—
Just picture the God of that day!

Do you think such a God, having infinit power
To wield it whenever he wills,
Appeals to my soul as the "God of all love"
When I gaze on humanity's ills?

A thousand times No! reëchoes the cry.
No blood-atoning tyrant for me.
The God I adore is Humanity's need;
'Tis knowledge that makes all men free.

There is not a slave so manacled, bound,
At the oars of the galleys to-day
As sectarian bigot, whose fanatic zeal
Leads him blindly and bids him obey.

But the day is at hand, for lo, through the dawn
Has arisen a bright-beaming star
Whose gleam is now shedding o'er desolate homes
The refulgence of peace from afar.

'Tis the bright star of Reason that lights up our path
We call it "the Light of To-day;"
Throwing round us a halo of gladness and joy
Erstwhile groping darkly our way.

Then onward, Progression! all hail to the day
When mankind shall throw off the chain
Of Religion's oppression—from serfdom set free,
Assert manhood, Freethinkers remain.

ELIZABETH LENAGHEN.

Two Truth-loving Seafarers.

HOUSE T, ROOM 237, SAILOR'S SNUG HARBOR,
NEW BRIGHTON, N. J., Sept. 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: My beloved guides, philosophers, and friends are Walt Whitman, Henry George, Herbert Spencer, and R. G. Ingersoll. With such to guide me along life's narrow path I ought to make a straight course in the pursuit of justice and virtue. The only reason I am not a subscriber to your valued paper is the entire want of cash. All needed commodities I hav freely, so that I do not care for cash, except in cases like the present one. Under such a state of things please tell me what means I shall use to obtain THE TRUTH SEEKER? Fraternally, your firm friend always,

CHARLES W. MANLEY-DESHON.

P.S.—James H. Penney, another inmate of Sailor's Snug Harbor, eighty-five years of age, who has worked for free land and free men for more than fifty years, now finds himself in a similar fix to myself.—M.-D.

[Perhaps some generous Freethinker will make these old sailor men happy by giving them the paper for a year. Though our own resources are pretty well taxed in this way, we will send it for $2 if some one feels like alleviating the lot of two impoverished mariners.—ED. T. S.]

A Kindly Act.

SAUGEOIT, Aug. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You can imagin the surprise of Brother Gilbert's noble, unselfish, generous, godlike act in conferring on me the donation of $3 to pay for my blessed TRUTH SEEKER for one year. Sir, this noble deed of Brother Gilbert (for I must call him brother, because old Paul said we hav "all one God [originating cause], therefore all ye are brethren") is true religion carried into practice. It is just what the world is starving for, after feeding on the degrading, demoralizing husks of popular Christianity for lo these nineteen hundred years. May God (or the Eternal Law of cause and effect) prosper and bless Brother Gilbert, as I know it, or he and she, will, for I do surely know that the god within him will say, "Well done," and if the god within say "Well done," what are other Gods to him? Hell is his frown, and where his smile is, there is heaven for the free. Brother Gilbert, I do sincerely thank you for this noble, godlike, unselfish generosity. As I said, this is true religion. This kind act of yours is laying up treasures in heaven—treasures which will not hav to be left behind, like material treasures, at the hour of transmigration, but will go with you over the willow-fringed river, and travel by your side in your pathway of endless progression, knowledge, wisdom, and goodness throughout the mighty roll of an unending eternity. When I say God bless you, I do not mean that old changeable anthropomorphous mythical God of Christianity, but the natural god of the universe, which is ever and always found within the domain of the laws of cause and effect. Historical Gods I invest no stock in. They are all man-made, of priestly invention, and hav ever been a blighting curse to poor humanity. J. P. SMITH.

The Georgia Wonder Defended.

LAKE CITY, IA., Sept. 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I notice an article from C. E. Werst in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 29th. I suppose he has reference to the article by myself in regard to the Georgia wonder. He thinks his article will be interesting to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. But Mr. Butler only shows how great a fool a man may make of himself who wants to be smart above other people, as the article of exposure has been proved to be false in every particular by a committee chosen to investigate the matter in full. C. E. must think we are a weak set of brothers in Iowa, to let Anna Abbott pass through our state and not detect her if she was a fraud. But such is not the case, and if Mr. Werst was lifted entirely clear of his chair by a light pressure of hands on the side of his head, as easily as one could lift a pound of coffee and without feeling the least pain, he would be convinced the little woman was no fraud. We think we hav as smart men in Iowa as Mr. W. P. Butler, and we truly hope more honest, and yet we could find no fraud with Anna Abbott, and with us she remains the greatest wonder of the age. My opinion is, if Mr. Butler could get the United States for detecting Anna Abbott in actual fraud in her exhibition of power he would die a poor man. Though I believe it is said very great men frequently die poor. I hav written this letter thinking perhaps all TRUTH SEEKER readers might not see the article by the committee exposing Butler's article as being untrue in every particular.

Yours for truth and justice, J. L. TOMPKINS.

A New Field Worker Welcomed.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Sept. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The object of this brief communication is to inform you that Secularism is still alive and kicking here in Pittsburgh. The old flag has never been lowered, but proudly floats to the breeze as of yore. The opening lecture of the season was delivered last Sunday afternoon in University Hall by the brilliant young Freethought advocate, John R. Charlesworth, of New York, before a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. Charlesworth is a young man of not more than twenty-eight years of age, full of youthful enthusiasm and sufficient combativ force to enable him to stand boldly yet calmly up before his critics, but at the same time free from that egotistical bombast which too often controls the young lecturer when first starting out in the field. He has certainly made his mark here, and will be welcomed by our people whenever he comes this way. The lecture made a very good impression. In some respects it was a disappointment (agreeably so). Many of the old veteran Materialists, as well as a few combativ Christians, went to hear a very fiery God-killing and ghost-annihilating discourse. But instead they heard a calm, manly, and logical presentation of reasons against a belief in God. His arguments were so conclusivly and forcibly presented that he left no ground for his theistic opponent to stand upon. The Freethought field needs more of this type of lecturers, and I only wish the supply was forthcoming. I feel safe in predicting a brilliant future for this young man if he is only blest with health and long life.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, ANTHONY BARKER.

The Church to Stand Trial.

MONSON, MASS., Sept. 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find an editorial taken from the Springfield Republican. It seems that our conservativ Methodist Episcopal press are slowly but surely coming to see the "folly of their way." Yet a little while and they will adopt the principles of the good old TRUTH SEEKER. Your readers may like to know that the "church is to be tried on the charge of blindness to the obvious signs of the times." Your well-wisher, F. Q. BALL.

So Dr. Briggs is to be tried, or rather Dr. Briggs has been indicted and the Presbyterian church is to be tried on the charge of blindness to the obvious signs of the times, which was a part of the scathing rebuke of Jesus to the Pharisees. Dr. Briggs has nothing to fear from this trial, for he has said nothing which his familiarity with the present condition of biblical scholarship did not compel him to say, and nothing which his accusers themselvs can convincingly gainsay, and nothing but which will be and is the commonplace of any truly progressiv theology. The question at issue in this trial is whether or no the Presbyterian church has kept pace with the growth of biblical knowledge or not, and whether it prefers to follow seventeenth century scholarship rather than that of the nineteenth, and therefore whether it has room in its fold for nineteenth century biblical scholars who are courageous and truth-loving enough to teach the results of modern study of the Bible, or not. If that church decides that "disbelief in the verbal inspiration and inerrancy of the holy scriptures" unfits Dr. Briggs for its membership, it will close its doors to practically all the young men of ability, courage, and scholarship who seek its ministry, for it is impossible for such not to know that at least so far as the revised text is concerned, there are both errors and corruptions in the Bible. This result will not necessarily follow the trial, if it ever takes place, for there is a middle course open to the accusers of Dr. Briggs which escapes this dilemma. There is room for the decision, in view of Dr. Briggs's positiv affirmation of his orthodoxy, that his language about the Bible is not inconsistent with the Confession of Faith, which puts the "light of nature" among the sources of revelation, as Dr. Briggs did the reason.

Godly Goings-on.

BOYNE FALLS, MICH., Aug. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In this quiet little hamlet on the banks of the Boyne with a population of about two hundred and fifty, we hav one Presbyterian shop, doing business on a very small scale. In fact, the material upon which they hav been working has become exhausted. The people, as a rule, being quite Liberal-minded, would rather hav their children engage in some healthful amusements, such as trout-fishing and baseball games, than persuade them to attend lectures on hell. The Holy Johns are losing their grip and it is only during sheep-shearing time (which comes during the winter in small towns, and then it is always done by some imported oal-heaver) that their lambs are meek and submissiv. The Methodists used to worship in the Presbyterian church, and, in fact, contributed quite a sum toward the building, etc. But the devil got in his work, as usual, and there was a division. The Methodist Episcopals went up into an exceeding high mountain and worshiped in the school-house. The majority of the school board being pious cranks, they hav virtually converted it into a God-house; hav excluded everything but Methodism, and hav locked out and refused to open the doors for a singing-school. They came out of a two-weeks ghost-dance that they held last winter with colors flying, having added thirty lambs to the fold, and immediately proceeded to build another house for the only true and living God. But lo! when they got some of the material together and foundation laid—those most essential things to make the mare go, and religion, too, and which faith will not bring without a great deal of hard labor—the imported hell-fire dispenser had gone to other folds, and business is at a standstill. About two weeks ago, their six months having expired, they used all possible means to get them wet, but only two little ones hav been redeemed. At Boyne City in this county, I am told, two were baptized of over one hundred converts. S. BARINGER.

That Free Speech Discussion.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 5, 1891.

MR EDITOR: It appears that Mr. Swartz's great plea is that it does not concern the public how many persons he writes up in his Sun, he being responsible to them individually and they bringing no suits. Why does he not accord to others the same right he claims for himself, that is, the right to govern their own acts, being individually responsible to any persons they may wrong? If a man wrongs a woman why not let him settle it with her or her father, brother, or husband? What business is it to Mr. Swartz? Is he, like Comstock, a guardian of public and private morals? Who gave him the right to play the role of a social Torquemada and inflict inquisitorial torture upon those who do not cut their social garments to please him? Mr. Swartz is inconsistent. He is either ignorant or dishonest, one or the other. Probably the latter. His desire to make money is greater than his desire to do right. For a few paltry dollars, he will violate the principles of Liberalism and trample the dearest rights of his fellows into the dust.

Mr. Swartz's victims hav no recourse in law, only in theory. In a recent business trip through Missouri and Kansas I took pains to inquire in several towns as to the responsibility of the Sun's correspondents, but I invariably found that they were incognitos, dirty sneaks who fired their poisoned arrows from ambush, midnight assassins crouching in the darkness and stabbing their victims in the back. A dozen such creatures in a town can convert it into a veritable hell. No one knows who they are; besides, they are financially irresponsible. The authorship of no squib or broadside in the Sun can be proven, neither can the victim prove beyond the shadow of a legal doubt that the deadly missil was intended for him or her, their name if appearing being spelled slightly wrong.

Evasion of the law does not sanctify a wrong act. Wearing a mask on one's face while stealing a horse may enable the thief to escape conviction but it does not justify the act. If Swartz is an exponent of Liberalism I think I will go back to the Catholic church. H. J. WERNWAG.

A Pack of Lies.

CHICAGO, ILL., Aug. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find extracts from a Dr. Pierson's sermon, which I cut out of the Inter-Ocean of this city. I hope you will hav something to say about the "twenty-three hours and twenty minutes," the time this knave claims the sun stood still at the command of General Joshua. When will these orthodox fools or knaves cease to proclaim the absurdities and falsehoods of their Bible? THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am glad to say, is not only a truth seeker, but a fearless truth-teller. "Long may it wave." Yours, etc., S. ROBERTS.

Dr. A. T. Pierson gave the address of the morning on "The Bible in its Relation to Scientific Truth." The Bible was not written to teach scientific truth, but religious; yet it could not well hav been written without containing hints or references to scientific things. At the time it was written the ideas of men in regard to science were very erroneous. Yet the Bible contains no erroneous views, even in its chance allusions. Had it plainly taught scientific truths, they would hav been revealed before man was ready to receive them: attention would hav been withdrawn from the main idea of the book; the Bible would hav been brought into disrepute because of the difference between the truths and the views then held. Again, the Bible does not reveal what man can find out for himself. Neither would God in the same book reveal spiritual truth and scientific error. Many statements are found in the Bible which contain germs of scientific truth, that were not noticed by the men who wrote them; but show that God by the Holy Spirit wrote the book. Notice some of the sciences referred to:

1. Cosmogony—General Moses put nothing in his writings so absurd as the old Hindoo cosmogony which is still taught by the Brahmins. They say that the earth is upheld on the backs of four elephants, who stand on the back of an immense tortoise, which is likewise supported by a large snake, coiled up with its head in its mouth; but he givs an account with which the latest discoveries and decisions of science exactly agree.

2. Astronomy—The speaker quoted from Totten to show that according to accurate mathematical calculations reckoned backward from the eclipse of June, 1890, it was necessary in order to get the time to come right to insert twenty-three hours twenty minutes at the time the sun stood still nearly a whole day for Joshua, and forty minutes for the time the shadow on the dial went back fifteen degrees for Isaiah. In Jere. xxxiii, 22, we read that "the hosts of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea be measured." The great astronomers, such as Hipparchus, said there were but 3,336 stars. Now we know that Jeremiah wrote truth. The number of the stars is infinit.

3. Optics—Sound and light are akin. Both are due to vibrations and are so compared in a wonderful way in the Bible.

4. Comparativ anatomy—Moses places animals in just the right position in the scale of being, although he could not hav studied comparativ anatomy. We are told to go to the ant for instruction. Some hav questioned the truth of Solomon's statements in regard to the ant. But the agricultural ant in Palestine proves that what he said is correct.

Who Will Bell the Cat?

NEW YORK, Sept. 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The communication of L. C. Gorman, of Ohio, upon the temperance question is so tinctured with the brutality of Christianity that I think he should be set right. As an old man past seventy, with a vivid remembrance of the past, I can say the drinking of spirituous liquors has gradually decreased during that entire period, not from any statute laws upon the question or from denunciatory tirades upon the matter, but from a natural growth of intelligence in the people, and their tendency to disbelief in supernatural religion. I well remember sixty years since a clergyman would not permit a temperance lecture to be delivered in "his" pulpit, but when the people's demands became clamorous he toadied to their demand, as he ever has done on that and every other question of reform.

The temperance question has been very intemperately managed. The fable of the sun and wind has been ignored, forgotten. Mr. Gorman says:

Since the government has given the liquor-vendors license and derives a formidable revenue, let them (the vendors) alone, but go for the habitual and professional drunkards or bibbers, and somewhat after this fashion: Take away their voting privileges, i. e., disfranchise them completely; and if they persist deny them further the privilege of testifying in court under oath or any other form of giving evidence.

The meaning of this is, since the government has made the business respectable, you should let the respectable ones engaged in it alone. I think it is this very respectability that keeps the traffic alive. If the streams flowed with whisky no one would want it. You should "go for the habitual drunkards" made so by the "respectable" vendor; deprive him of his vote, not permitting him to testify in courts. In olden times the Infidel was not allowed to vote, and it was not until quite lately that he was allowed to giv evidence in courts, and even in not all of the states at this time.

It may be said that some of the old topers would go on drinking, thoroughly indifferent about voting, etc. My answer is, make all these break stones for macadamizing the country pikes and improving the condition of them, and thereby reduce taxation.

You hav a very cast-iron way of getting a man on his dignity. It is a settled scientific fact that the habitual drunkard is diseased; will breaking stone cure him?

Are you a voter? If so, will you please inform me what practical benefit you ever derived from that pastime?

Now I would strike a blow at a few others, and they are the following—the gamblers, the habitual loafers, confidence men, thieves, blacklegs, criminals, and hard cases of all kinds. Take away their franchises and testifying privilege at court, and generally make them equal to ciphers in this great nation, and if necessary compel them to wear a badge describing the grade of their uselessness.

This is all very well, and while you are at the useless classes, why not include them all—the lawyer, priest, bankers, and those that corner bread-stuff on the consumers? Your idea of the badge reminds me of the story of the rats who called a meeting to devise a way and means to tell when the cat was coming. A gray old rat proposed to put a bell on the cat. This was enthusiastically seconded by all the rats, and the mover of this proposition was elected to put on the bell.

I inclose an opinion on the drinking habit from a noted distiller of Norway and Sweden, which I commend to you.

GEO. M. DAVENPORT.

The principal distiller of Norway and Sweden—countries in which one of the leading industries is the drinking of ardent spirits—has recently become an advocate of temperance. Instead, however, of urging pledges and prayers as sufficient reformatory measures, he is devoting his energies and money to the task of seeing that the people, as a body, are better fed. He argues that insufficient food or badly prepared food weakens the system and causes a craving for stimulants, and consequently he believes that by proper feeding the people can be cured of the drinking habit.

There are many physical weaknesses which no quality or quantity of food can cure, and which impel people to drink spirits. It is nevertheless true that in all countries the average consumption of liquor is smallest in those classes which are properly nourished. An indigestible meal will make the most temperate person long for stimulants; so will the physical weakness that comes of too few meals of any kind. Many well-fed men consume large quantities of alcohol, sometimes from taste or habit, but oftener because they are trying to do two or three days' work in one day's time. For the mass of the people, however, there is no better preventiv of the craving than a proper quantity of proper food.

The News from Australia.

SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, June 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav long thought of appearing among the "Letters from Friends" in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav just come to Sydney after an absence of months, and after inquiring for the Liberator next comes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been honored with mention in your pages once or twice in the cause of Freethought, and a short explanation of my Freethought work might be acceptable to your readers. Inclosed with this is a photograph of the ever-shifting home which brings me in contact with hundreds in the year who would never otherwise hear of the glorious gospel of Freethought.

In the early ages of Christianity its advocates labored without money and without price. It was a growth of the times, a factor in the evolution of thought, that like Buddhism started with better promises than it carried out. Christianity's first missionaries "carried packs through the provinces and held stalls at fairs," and maintained themselvs, like the alleged Paul, "with the work of their own hands." Thus it spread by the zeal of its believers, as all new reformations must, by the self-denial of their followers. But times changed when Christianity became a state religion. She became bloated with wealth and power and is so at the present moment.

Freethought now is poor, meets mostly in small rooms and by the wayside, the despised and rejected of men, and let us hope in the day of her power which is surely coming she will not be like Christianity, drunk with success.

The laborers of Freethought are few, and its harvest is great in Australia, and I can see by your paper it is the same in America. Your population is sixty-two million, ours not five million, but the theater is the same in both continents. Yours is the larger, with a greater variety; ours being smaller makes greater difficulty. When I was in Tasmania in 1887 it was mentioned in THE TRUTH SEEKER about intimations posted on the trees to shun the Infidel and run him out of our "happy little valley." It was true. That little valley was a hotbed of religion—Salvation Army, Baptists, Wesleyans, and others. A youth came in great anxiety—he had ridden some miles—and said, "Are you the man that speaks against religion?" He looked as if I should stand speechless before him. "No," I said; "religion is the bonds of science that keep society together. But superstition and the worship of a God invented by man seeks to make men moral with a lie." I took the Bible, read some of its damning passages, and spoke with a power that astonished myself. "And the young man went away exceeding sorrowful" to hear his idols demolished. Then the notices were put up on the trees to damage my means of living, but after all it did not do much, as only two families stayed away.

Your readers might be curious to know how we liv to be a Freethought missionary. Would you believe it, I am a showman. Not as great as the late Barnum, but perhaps happier in my own way. I hav often sacrificed my show to my principles, perhaps more than Mr. Barnum ever did. But, to do him justice, he belonged to one of the least offensiv of religious sects, who believe that everybody will be saved at last, even Infidels.

Past experience has taught me to be wise as serpents, cunning as foxes, and harmless as doves in this Freethought propaganda. "He that fights and runs away will liv to fight another day." Where it is not possible to show our hand, hide for better opportunities when we can strike home. In my last visit to Tasmania, 1889, I had a glorious revenge. The steamer was to start on Monday, and all my business was over on Saturday, so Sunday was dedicated to free speech. Launceston has nearly twenty thousand inhabitants, a hotbed of bigotry. But a select band of Freethinkers on Sundays go to the wharf and speak their minds. The greatest is a quarryman. He works at the hard rocks, and at the hard, stony hearts of the Christians. He gave it out that a Freethinker from Melbourne would speak on Sunday, and to our astonishment there was a gathering of over two thousand people. A restaurant-keeper, a nativ of America, acted as chairman and held my books of reference. We stood on an agricultural engin on the wharf and faced one of the greatest Freethought meetings ever held in Tasmania. Two Christian opponents started at the other end of the crowd, but as the argument became "fast and furious" they left them and came to the Infidel. We vindicated the character of Thomas Paine and quoted what Napoleon is said to hav said regarding him: "His monument ought to be set up in gold in every city." This astonished the Christians. One came and said, "He died a drunkard, and wished to recant what he had written." I produced the "Age of Reason," and read Addison's hymn, "The spacious firmament on high," which Paine adduced as his faith, for he was a Deist. It struck them dumb. Then we smashed the Bible, held its God up to scorn and contempt, showed that the Infidels and Atheists had been the heroes of progress and the true saviors of mankind. They could not stand it any longer. They rushed over our standing-place, tore some of our books and papers, but a body-guard of Freethinkers conveyed us off the ground. They knew that many minds that day had lost superstition and got a glimpse of the new gospel that was taught by Paine and consummated by modern thought.

Around our cart the battles of Freethought hav often been fought. To hungry minds we hav given Ingersoll's, Bradlaugh's, and other pamphlets for nothing when we knew it was a good soil. This process of undermining Christianity with Freethought literature is a splendid work. It grows every year. Last year I gave away over two thousand Liberators (Australia's Freethought paper, editor Joseph Symes), National Reformers, and TRUTH SEEKERS. THE TRUTH SEEKER I make do good duty through its pictures. They think America must be red-hot for Freethought. In the Freethought bookstore and Liberator office, Bourk street, Melbourne, THE TRUTH SEEKER lines the window and hundreds see it every day. Mr. Heston I look upon as a genius. Long may his pencil flourish to kill superstition. The pen and pencil combined will prove irresistible.

Lastly, let American Freethinkers remember that thousands in Australia are deeply interested in the progress of American Freethought. Every true Freethinker remembers the immortal words of Thomas Paine, "The world is my country and to do good is my religion." A. D. DOWNES.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Categorical.

A QUIET YOUNG GENTLEMAN SPEAKS TO THE PURPOSE.

I am a little yellow kit,
Contented, cunning, plump, and merry,
Without a care—no, wait a bit,
For now I come to think of it,
I want to be as old as Jerry;
Me-ow, I do
Wish I could be as old as Jerry!

For Jerry is a great gray cat
(I know his fur was never yellow),
He caught a mouse, he killed a rat,
He knocked the next-door terrier flat:
Old Jerry is a splendid fellow.
Purr-ur, yes, sir!
He is a most tremendous fellow.

And Jerry likes to hunt and fight;
With head erect and long tail curled,
I see him sitting every night
Upon the fence, a noble sight;
He is a cat that knows the world.
Me-ow, that's so—
Old Jerry thinks he owns the world!

And Jerry has such thick gray fur—
My yellow sides are soft as silk.
You heard him mew? You hear me purr.
The chicken bones for Jerry were,
They gave to me a cup of milk.
Purr-ur, no, sir!
There's nothing nicer than new milk.

I try to do my very best,
Although I'm but a little kit;
I wash my snow-white paws and breast;
And then curl up to take a rest.
I never scratch nor hav a fit;
Me-ow, oh, no,
Such conduct would be far from fit.

When Jerry lifts his heavy paws
And hits me on my little ear,
By way of teaching me the laws,
I never hit him back, because
So very pert it would appear;
Me-ow, oh, how
Extremely pert I should appear!

So he in his way, I in mine,
Are said to be the best of cats;
His eyes like great green emeralds shine,
My eyes are like brown tourmaline;
We both can jump like acrobats,
Purr-ur, never were
Two livelier, jolly acrobats!

They tell me, Jerry, is it true?
That you were little once and merry,
That you hav been a kitten, too.
And I shall be as large as you,
A grown-up cat, like you, old Jerry.
Purr ur, yes, sir!
I hope I may be just like Jerry.

For he's a help about the house,
And I am but a pretty toy;
He drives away the rat and mouse,
Lest they become too numerous—
I'm only little Kitty-boy;
Me-ow, I make my bow,
Good-bye, says little Kitty-boy.

Curious Lime Formations.

CALCITE.

About three miles from where the writer resides is a curious, yet common freak of nature—a limestone bed intermixed with wonderful carbonates of different forms and colors, which hav, in time past, issued from the limestone in a liquid state, and afterward become hardened. This bed of stone has been converted into an immense quarry, and on being opened a spectacle of natural beauty greeted the eyes of those who were present. The molten mass had flowed down the huge stones, leaving a glossy coat (stalagmite); and on the edges where it dripped off, wonderful concretions (stalactites) were formed in the shape of icicles, some of them being nearly a foot in length. This liquid had assumed many other curious concretions, besides much of it being crystallized in a great variety of forms. Geologists attribute these concretions and incrustations to dripping water among the rock. These limestone beds afford a great amount of study for young as well as old geologists, and it would require a volume to fully describe the different fissures, etc., which characterize these deposits. They usually contain different varieties of limestone, such as fossiliferous limestone, or that which contains fossils; magnesian, or dolomitic limestone, or that which consists of carbonate of lime and magnesia; hydraulic, or that which is impure, etc.

The essential ingredient of limestone is carbonate of lime, or calcite, and consists of carbonic acid and lime. Nearly all of the limestone rocks are probably of organic origin; they hav been derived from shells, corals, and other animal remains. This shows the vast amount of life that has lived and died through the past ages, for there are all over the earth immense deposits of limestone. Much more could be said of the common limestone and the peculiar composition and curious formations; but to do the subject justice, it would take all of your space and more, too; and besides, it requires a more experienced geologist than myself and a better writer at that. English Legend, Revised.

Dear Young Friends: Seth, his sister Jane, and the raven started on a long journey in a frail vehicle, although, I believe, this was drawn by the raven himself. Nothing could exceed his devotion to these two children. They soon approached a town from which arose into the mighty air a multitude of steeples. For years the breath of prayer had ascended from those, yet a man who belonged to one of them approached them and demanded money or life. The raven, not the least disconcerted, picked a hole in the robber's neck, near the jugular vein, when he took to his heels, and they saw him no more.

The next disturbance was a mob of tramps who ridiculed the carriage, trying to upset it. A preacher of burly figure passing by offered not the least assistance. An army of wicked children now came near, who tried in the roughest way to molest the harmless party, hooting, screaming, and insulting. The raven passed quietly on. Before they reached a dwelling they were stopped by groups of fighting men shooting in every direction, but the bullets dropped before the eye of the raven, and no harm was done. Jane, being frightened, was seized with a fainting fit, so that the raven had her carried into a stately mansion, where she was put into a close room which increased her sufferings. Family worship was in progress with much whining and singing. It was hardly over when a lady and a gentleman, whose voices were the loudest, quarreled fearfully about a broken engagement. The gentleman drew a pistol and killed the beautiful girl, himself also. Drunken men trampled on the bleeding bodies; they had been cheating at cards, both also guilty of forgery—a Sunday-school superintendent and a church-member. A reverend was preaching on the street, but our party passed on in disgust. An Infidel met them, kindly saying, "Come in, all of you; your troubles are all over." This was the first appearance of civilization they had encountered. ALHAZA.

A Child's View of Hell.

The children were playing in the yard. Mamma sat sewing by the window, and overheard the following conversation. Charlie spoke first.

"Do you ever feel real mean when you do anything wrong, Helen?"

"I never thought about it," replied Helen.

"Don't you ever feel just kind of hot and on fire from your head clear down to your feet?"

"No, I don't know as I do."

"Well, I tell you I do," went on Charlie reflectivly. "First my head gets all hot and my face red, and I feel awfully, as if I was going to burn up; and the feeling keeps spreading and spreading until I tingle clear down into my fingers and toes. And, Helen," he added, after two or three vicious digs into the earth, "I just believe that's hell."

A True Hero.

Let me giv you an instance of wonderful heroism rising to meet the demands of a sudden crisis.

It was not an hour after dawn, yet the great Central Station was full.

The soft morning air blew freshly through the long line of cars and puffing engins. A faint hum comes from without. It was the great city awakening for the day. A Scotch coolie, belonging to one of the emigrant groups, went from one to another wagging his tail and looking up with mild and expressiv eyes full of good-natured, friendly feeling. Children called to him, some students romped with him, the ladies patted his head, a poor negro in the corner shared his meal with him, and then he seemed to unite all these different groups in a common tie of good feeling. While all this was going on a woman was washing the windows of some empty cars drawn onto the siding, singing as she rubbed the lass. While her back was turned, her child, a little fellow about three years old, ran to the door of the car and jumped down on the next track. Upon this track the Eastern express was coming. Directly in its path was the babe; a hush of horror fell upon the crowd. Every eye turned in the direction, and then a low sob of anguish went up from the paralyzed people. The dog, with head erect, and fixed eye, saw the danger, and with a bound and a fierce bark darted toward the child. The baby, frightened, started back. The mother went on washing windows and singing, as the huge engin rushed up abreast of her car. There was a crunching noise and a faint little cry of agony. Even strong men grew sick at the sound and turned away.

When they looked again, the baby was toddling across the platform, crowing and laughing, and the crushed dead body of a dog lay on the track. "Passengers for Pittsburgh, Chicago, and the West. Passengers for Baltimore, Richmond, and the South," and so the cry went on, and the surging crowd passed out, never to all meet again in this world. But the faces of men and women were pale, and there were tears in the eyes of some. The poor negro and the millionaire, tottering old men and frolicking boys, had been helped onward, upward, by the friendly, cheerful life and heroic death of a dumb dog.

Dare we assert that when the limp body, sacrificed to save the life of another, lay on the track, the heroic spirit that once animated it was quenched into utter nothingness?—Rev. F. M. Todd, Manassas, Va.

A Thoughtful Youngster.

A dear little boy five years old had passed rather a trying day. With the best of intentions, he could not quiet his irrepressible spirits. He could not remember to mind, and had received severe reprimands. That night, when he ended his prayers with the usual petition, "And make me a good little boy," he rose suddenly from his knees, looked up into his aunt's face, and made this innocent remark: "Isn't it funny, aunty? God can do everything else, but he can't make me a good boy."—New York Tribune.

Correspondence.

ROCKVILLE, IDA., Sept. 4, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav not seen many letters in the Corner, I thought I would write. The weather is very hot. I would like for some of the boys of the Corner to write to me. The field is green on the ranch. I will be fourteen the 13th of this month. If my letter escapes the waste-basket I will be surprised. My post-office address is Rockville, Owyhee co., Ida. Yours truly,
W. A. CARLTON.

ROCKVILLE, IDA, Sept. 4, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav not written to the Children's Corner before. I will write and write good. I will sign my whole name. It is not a nice name. We hav a pretty place. It is green and nice. The trees are green. We hav a pretty flower garden; all the plants are in bloom. We hav a tall flower that is taller than I or a woman's head. It is cold at nights. Father is gone now. I will close for this time. From your little truth seeker, ROSE ALICE CARLTON.

THE
French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparativ oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

WHAT a picture is presented by the church! A few in life's last storm are to be saved; and the saved, when they reach shore, are to look back with joy upon the great ship going down to the eternal depths! This is what I call the unutterable meanness of orthodox Christianity.—Ingersoll.

THE better part [of Christ's moral teachings] is that which is non-original All that is fair and beautiful in Christian morality had been taught in the world ages before Christ was born. Buddha, Confucius, Lao-Tsze, Mencius, Zoroaster, Manu, taught the noble human morality found in some of the teaching ascribed to Christ.—Annie Besant.

A FEW hundreds of Indian women, at most, hav furnished this horrid spectacle [burning of the wife on the husband's death]; but our Inquisitions, our atrocious madmen calling themselvs judges, hav put to death in the flames more than a hundred thousand of our brethren—men, women, and children—for things which no one has understood. Let us pity and condemn the Brahmins; but let us not forget our miserable selvs.—Voltaire.

THE effect of "trust in God" is offset by "fear of God." A belief in a superintending providence that arbitrarily decides the issues of life is not promotiv of peace of mind. One never knows what the will of God may decree next, and an element of uncertainty is introduced into human affairs beyond the elements of cause and effect. The Christian labors with the dread that at any moment God may thwart his efforts in "love" or "wrath," and giv the success to some scoundrel apparently unworthy of favors.—Adams.

THE abolition of this ancient and elevated faith; the dethronement of God; the extinction of piety as a personal feeling; the destruction of an image made of golden thoughts in the exquisit form of an ideal man and tenderly enshrined in the human heart—these appear to be evils, and such undoubtedly they are. But the conduct of life is a choice of evils. We can do nothing that is exclusivly and absolutely good. No useful invention can be introduced without some branch of industry being killed and hundreds of worthy men being cast out, without an occupation, on the world. All mental revolutions are attended by catastrophe. The mummeries and massacres of the German Reformation, though known only to scholars, were scarcely less horrible than those of Paris in '93, and both periods illustrate the same law. I hav facts in my possession which would enable me to show that the abolition of the slave trade, that immortal and glorious event, caused the death of many thousand slaves, who were therefore actually killed by Sharp, Clarkson, Wilberforce, and their adherents. But by means of abolition millions of lives hav since been saved. The first generation suffered; prisoners were captured to be sold, and the market having been suppressed, were killed. This was undoubtedly an evil. But then the slavemaking wars came to an end and there was peace. In the same manner I maintain that even should the present generation be injured by the abolition of existing faiths, yet abolition would be justified. Succeeding generations would breathe an atmosphere of truth, instead of being reared in an atmosphere of falsehood, and we who are so deeply indebted to our ancestors hav incurred obligations toward our posterity. Let us, therefore, purify the air, and if the light kill a few sickly plants which hav become acclimatized to impurity and darkness, we must console ourselvs with the reflection that in nature it is always so, and that of two evils we hav chosen that which is the least.—Reade.

HOW THE CLERGY HAV ALWAYS OPPOSED THE MARCH OF PROGRESS.

Notes and Clippings.

WHEN some men pay the preacher they feel as though they were paying a gas bill.

PAPAL nuncios hav been directed to call the attention of all Catholic sovereigns to the depleted condition of the pope's treasury.

BALMACEDA, finding blocked all routes of escape from the unforgiving revolutionists, committed suicide. At this the Catholics exult, as "he had continually been harassing religion."

AT the convocation of Zion's Sanctuary of Faith Curers in Jersey City Rev. W. L. Brown said twenty-two years ago the doctors gave him up to die from dyspepsia. Through prayer the Lord cured him, and now he can load his stomach with green cucumbers with impunity.

A PROPOSITION to hav Col. Robert G. Ingersoll make an address at the Texas state fair in Dallas this fall has been sharply condemned by certain newspapers and townspeople. But the president of the fair association declares that the colonel will come just the same, and talk, too.

A RUTLAND, Vt., dispatch says: "Two men are now hard at work cutting the Lord's Prayer on the face of a big rock on the Bristol road. They are hired by Dr. Green. The rock is at about the hardest place in Vermont for a team, and in the season when teaming is liveliest there is more cussing there every day than anywhere else in Vermont. It is possible that Dr. Green's idea is to furnish the drivers with some new quotations."

THE proposed marriage of the Russian czarewitch and his cousin is in opposition to the Russian canonical law, by which consanguinity is an obstacle to marriage, but the objection will probably be overcome by the consent of the holy synod and by the issue of a ukase, which is as powerful as a papal bull, the czar being de facto ecclesiastical as well as lay head of the Russo-Greek church.

THE marine draws some of the inspiration for his imagery from the libraries that are maintained at every barracks for his benefit. Marines do not care for religious books, and utterly disdain the stories of the pious young mariners whose lives are saved by the little Testaments their mothers gave them. But there are some who may be seen poring over the "Origin of Species," or Spencer's "Synthetic Philosophy."

ACCORDING to the papers of Berlin, it is not only the Jews that are being driven out of Russia, but also the Catholics, who are daily crowding into Charlottenburg in order to come to America. As they are entirely destitute of means, collections are taken up for them in several European cities. The press of our country has had much to say about the persecution of the Jews in Russia, but has not alluded to the ill treatment of Catholics.—Ave Maria.

JOHN SEQUE, of New York, was found standing on the steps of his home saying to passers by: "How do you do? I am waiting for a pair of wings." A police officer happened to pass and asked Seque what he was going to do with the wings. "Why, be an angel, of course, and fly about in the golden streets." The police officer told Seque that he would find a most beautiful pair of wings down the street, and offered to show him the way. Seque accepted the offer and walked into the insane asylum.

IN the theater of the Russian religious persecutions, with the horrors of starvation now added, new-comers and nativs wrestle together in a confused nightmare of despair for very existence, like rats imprisoned by a rising flood. Out of this tragic hurly-burly some three or four thousand are able each week to fight their way over the tops of others and escape across the frontier. This panic-stricken stream of fugitivs is all that Europe sees of the persecution. Of the horrors which remain behind it has hardly the vaguest idea. Such is what Christianity brings a country to.

PROFESSOR NEWCOMB has seen science transform too many wonders into familiar uses of daily life to risk the assertion that we shall never know how to make it rain. But he does not hesitate to say that rain cannot be produced by concussion. He believes that the popular notion that great battles hav generally been followed by heavy rain is not confirmed by statistics; but he adds that "if it be really true that rains hav been produced by great battles, we may say with confidence that they were produced by the smoke from the burning powder rising into the clouds and forming nuclei for the agglomeration into drops, and not by the mere explosion."

A MR. BOOTH, who founded a workingman's debating club in which religious discussions are prohibited, wrote to Gladstone to ask whether he considered Theosophy to come under the head of religion. Gladstone replies: "I do not adopt the language of determined disbelief in all manifestations real or supposed from the other world, which is the habit of many. They giv me little satisfaction, but that does not warrant meeting them with a blank negativ. I cannot conceive how either spiritism (better so called than spiritualism) or Theosophy can with consistency be discussed in societies of workingmen or in any other societies which exclude all subjects calculated to lead to religious discussion. Spiritism and Theosophy, as I understand the matter, deal with the facts and phenomena of the other worlds as much as the Christian creeds."

M. HENRI ROCHEFORT, the French political agitator exiled in England, says: "How I appreciate the personal liberty and freedom from official surveillance in England! In Paris there were always three or four policemen stationed about my house, watching my movements and prying into my affairs. I had no means of ridding myself of this espionage. Here, if a man should attempt to hang about my door I hav only to complain to the nearest policeman to hav the nuisance abated. It is all so well arranged, and the judges in the courts are so free to act according to the dictates of justice and law regardless of the wishes of the government. Everything is so secure under the laws of England. On Sunday I see labor organizations parading with music and banners, not in spite of the police, but actually under police protection. The very soldiers in the barracks waved their handkerchiefs at the dock strikers. Imagin soldiers doing that in France! . . . Even my next-door neighbor does not know my name. The lack of official supervision is very marked in London."

The Gospel According to John.

I.

All that we know of the life of Jesus, miscalled Christ, is told us in the gospels. The first three of these, sometimes called the synoptics, repeat the same stories, miracles, doctrins, and incidents to a very large extent, and follow nearly the same order of events.

"The whole of Mark's gospel, except twenty-four verses," says Dr. Davidson, "is contained either in Matthew's or Luke's." He therefore infers that it was compiled from the two; and he further says: "It is clear that the first gospel was employed directly by the writer of the third."

Let us now consider the gospel according to John, independently of or contradictory to the other three evangelists. What does the writer of the fourth gospel tell us?

1 He says nothing about the birth of Jesus.

2 He never names the mother of Jesus. She is alluded to in chapter ii as being present at the marriage in Cana, and in chapter xix as being at the cross. And it is remarkable that the account of the marriage feast is told only by John, and that the presence of the mother of Jesus at the cross is contradicted by Matthew and Mark, who say that certain women from Galilee stood afar off at the crucifixion, among whom they name two Marys, but neither of them the mother of Jesus.

3. John introduces Jesus as "the Logos," says that the Logos was God, that "all things were made by him," that "the Logos was made flesh and dwelt among men," and "that he was the only begotten of the father." Philo Judæus, of Alexandria, who lived between 20 B C. and 50 A D., discoursed on the Logos. It is uniformly translated "word" in the New Testament. As applied to Jesus Dr. Clarke says it should hav been left untranslated, like the appellativ christos. But why should not christos hav been translated? It means 'anointed" and should hav been rendered in Latin unctus. Christus is not a Latin word.

4 John makes the ministry of Jesus cover a period of more than three years. He attends the feast of the Passover at Jerusalem (ii, 13; A.D. 30); again, "the feast of the Jews" (v, 1; A.D 31); again, "the feast of tabernacles" (vii, 2, 10; A D 32, autumn); and lastly the Passover (xiii, 1; A D 33) But the synoptics make Jesus attend but one Passover (A D. 33), and therefore limit his ministry to about one year.

5 John tells us that Simon and Andrew, the first two disciples of Jesus, were followers of John the Baptist, and nothing is said about their being fishermen.

6. Andrew first meets Jesus and then goes and tells his brother Simon: "We hav found the meshiha." Meshiha is an Aramaic or Syriac word meaning "anointed." The Greek translator transfers the word and adds an explanation, so that the passage reads: "We hav found the messias, which is, being interpreted, Christos." Messias is not a Greek word; it occurs twice in John's gospel and nowhere else.

7. When Jesus beheld Simon he said: "Thou art Simon the son of Jona, thou shalt be called Kepha." This was plain enough to a nativ of that country, for Kepha meant stone. But here again the Greek translator adds an explanation, so that it reads, "Thou shalt be called Kepha, which is by interpretation Petros." Such is the origin of the name Peter, as applied to the apostle Simon; Kepha was his other name and never Petros.

8 If the marginal chronology of our Bibles is to be trusted the period of the ministry of John the Baptist, prior to the beginning of that of Jesus, was four years, and those four years are marked on the margin of the first chapter of John as follows:

"John bare witness of him" (i, 15; A D 26).

"The next day John seeth Jesus" (i, 29; A.D. 26).

"Again, the next day after, John stood, and two of his disciples; and looking on Jesus as he walked he saith, 'Behold the Lamb of God'" (i, 35, 36; A D 26 continued)

"The day following Jesus would go forth into Galilee" (i, 43; A D 30).

"And the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee" (ii, 1; A D 30).

Does not this marginal chronology appear to be false? The baptism of Jesus by John took place when they first met (i, 29). The next day John seeing Jesus walking said, "Behold the Lamb of God!" The day following Jesus would go into Galilee. And the third day he was at a marriage in Galilee. Is it not apparent that the writer narrates the events of three or four consecutiv days?

9. John says nothing of the forty days' temptation. Nor, indeed, does he leave room for the same. The synoptics describe it as following immediately after the baptism. How is it possible to interpose forty days between the baptism and the marriage in Cana of Galilee? Is it not plain enough that that marriage was the third day after the baptism?

10 After the performance of the first miracle at the marriage feast in Galilee, John tells us that Jesus went down to Capernaum, where he continued "not many days," and the passover being at hand he went up to Jerusalem. There the first thing he did was to drive out the money-changers from the temple. The marginal date of this first visit to Jerusalem is A D. 30. But the synoptics, which describe only one visit to Jerusalem, put it at the close of the ministry of Jesus, and the marginal date is A D. 33.

11. Could the writer of the fourth gospel hav been a Jew? From first to last he speaks of the Jews as if he was a born Gentile and a Jew-hater. The word Jew is of rare occurrence in the synoptics and is never used opprobriously. In the fourth gospel it occurs seventy times and is frequently used offensivly.

12. At Jerusalem "a man of the Pharisees named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews," called on Jesus by night. When Pompey was in the region of Damascus, 64 B C, the two brothers, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, contestants for the Jewish crown, each sent an embassador to the Roman general, and the name of Aristobulus's minister was Nicodemus—"a man of the Pharisees" and "a ruler of the Jews." And it was not very many years before the invasion of Pompey that Jesus was stoned and hanged for alleged sorcery, in the reign of Alexandra, mother of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus.

13 While Jesus sojourned in Judea, John was baptizing in that country, says the fourth gospel, and adds: "For John was not yet cast into prison." This is a contradiction of the synoptics, which tell us that John was imprisoned just after the temptation, and before Jesus went into Galilee (Matt. iv, 12; Mark i, 14).

14 Nowhere in the synoptics is there an intimation that either Jesus or his disciples baptized. But the fourth gospel, after saying that Jesus tarried with his disciples "and baptized," and again, "how the Pharisees had heard that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John," adds in parenthesis, "Though Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples."

15. Returning from Judea to Galilee through Samaria Jesus met a woman at Jacob's well. The disciples were gone away into the city of Sychar (an unknown place) to buy food. A dialog ensued between the woman and Jesus. We quote a portion as recorded in the ancient Syriac New Testament:

"The woman said to him: 'I know that Messiah will come; and when he cometh he will teach us everything.' Jesus said to her: 'I who talk to thee, am he.'"

The Greek version, which must hav been a translation from the Aramaic or Syriac, again interpolates after "Messias" the explanatory words "which is called Christos."

This story of the woman is told only by the writer of the fourth gospel, who could hav repeated the dialog only from hearsay, purporting to come from either the Samaritan woman or Jesus himself.

16 Arriving at Cana in Galilee a nobleman besought Jesus to heal his son who was at the point of death. "Go thy way," said Jesus; "thy son liveth." And from that hour the sick son began to amend. This second miracle of Jesus in Galilee is unnoticed in the synoptics.

17. The next event recorded by John is a second visit to Jerusalem. The "feast of the Jews" (i.e. the Passover) again drew Jesus there. The first thing he did there was curing a sick man at the pool of Bethesda. This being done on the Sabbath day gave mortal offense to the Jews. They saw the invalid walking away with his bed, and wanted to know who told him to do it. But the man could not tell them, because Jesus had disappeared from the crowd and was a stranger to him. But afterward Jesus met him in the temple and said: "Behold, thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee." Then the man went and told the Jews that it was Jesus who had cured him. Therefore they sought to slay Jesus for curing on the Sabbath day. He defended himself, saying:

> My father worketh hitherto and I work. . . . The son can do nothing himself but what he seeth the father do. . . . He that honoreth the son honoreth the father. . . . He that heareth my word and believeth on him that sent me hath everlasting life. . . . The hour is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the son of God, and they that hear shall liv. . . . The hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth, they that hav done good to the resurrection of life, and they that hav done evil to the resurrection of damnation. . . . If I bear witness of myself my witness is not true. . . . The father himself which hath sent me hath borne witness of me. Ye hav neither heard his voice nor seen his shape. And ye hav not his word abiding in you; for whom he hath sent him ye believe not. Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye hav eternal life; and they are they which testify of me. . . . Had ye believed Moses ye would hav believed me; for he wrote of me.

Could a sane person hav made a speech like that? And did the disciple John report it from memory?

ANTICHRIST

The Mockery of Thanksgiving Proclamations.

Truth is that which, in the face of all possible opposition, can be shown to be in conformity with fact and sound reason.

Is not falsehood always injurious to those who entertain it, and is not deception ever degrading to those who practice it? Mankind are perishing for lack of knowledge of natural laws, and yet millions of dollars, immensity of effort, and one day in every seven is spent in teaching them fables that originated in the childhood of the world, and that the learning and common sense of unbiased, educated minds hav outgrown and know to be demoralizing and pernicious.

Gen. U. S. Grant said: "Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school supported by private contributions, but keep church and state forever separate."

Colonel Ingersoll says: "You might as well hav a government united by force with art, or with poetry, or with oratory as with religion. Religion should hav the influence upon mankind that its goodness, that its morality, its justice, its charity, its reason, and its arguments giv it, and no more. The religion that has to be supported by law is without value, is not only a fraud but a curse.

"Our fathers devoted their lives and fortunes to the grand work of founding a government for the protection of the rights of man.

"The theological idea as to the source of political power had poisoned the web and woof of every government in the world, and our fathers tried to banish it from this continent forever. What we want today is what our fathers wrote down. They did not attain their ideal. We approach it nearer but hav not reached it yet.

"We want not only the independence of the state, not only the independence of a nation, but something far more glorious, the absolute independence of the individual. And to this every lover of liberty, every true man and good woman, will say amen."

Our Washington constitution comes nearest to the ideal, being the most Liberal of any state in the Union. Art. i, sec. 11 reads: "Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual."

The God-in-the-Constitution party, the National Sabbath Union, the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union are united in opposing this just and wise provision.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ALL.

The Washington Secular Union claims that all possess an equal right to believe and profess any religious system that they think true, however erroneous it may seem to others.

That all hav a right to believe in the existence of any God they think best, to worship him or not as they please, when and where they please, and in what manner they think proper, so long as they do not interfere with the exercise of the equal rights of others.

That no individual nor any number of persons, whether self-associated or delegated by others, possess any right to use coerciv means to restrain any person from the full enjoyment of any religious sentiment, belief, or worship, or to induce them to profess any religious creed or acknowledge any God, perform any worship, or contribute any means to support any religion, and much less any which they do not conscientiously believe to be true.

That the exercise of physical force, the constable's club, fine, or imprisonment, to enforce any religious rite, duty, or observance, is a violation of natural right, and contrary alike to the letter and spirit of our state constitution.

RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCES REST SOLELY BETWEEN MAN AND HIS GOD

Any and every duty or obligation to perform religious rites or observe holy feast, fast, or church days or observances rest solely between man and his God. And if any person refuses or neglects such religious observances he is responsible only to his God, and not to the civil government, nor to any other man or any assembly of men.

Any official act either of the executiv, legislativ, or judiciary departments enforcing, favoring, or aiding the operation of any religious or sectarian doctrin, dogma, or duty, or which shall be intended directly or indirectly to effect such a purpose, is in fact a union of church and state, an attempt to hoist the cross above the flag. Hence proclamation by president or governor of a day of "Thanksgiving to almighty God" is an act of spiritual intolerance and oppression; a violation of our national and state constitutions; an unrighteous stretch of power; a pandering to a class of fanatical religionists who acknowledge that their religion is only of human origin and has not the sanction of God, or it would not need to be bolstered up by the acts of political tricksters, demagogs, and sycophant officeholders. For to appeal to or accept aid from the secular power is to admit they doubt, nay, are well convinced, divine aid would be asked in vain.

No man can ever of right make his religion the basis of any plea for government favor. Our government is civil, not ecclesiastical. It has no religion, and therefore no authority to issue proclamations to observe any time for worship, prayers, feasts, fasts, or holy days.

The annual proclamations by presidents and governors, servants of the people, is a gross insult to the intelligence of the citizens, their employers.

NO OBJECTION TO TURKEY.

Thanksgiving day as a general holiday, as a play-day after the toils of harvest, affording opportunity for family reunions, if simply appointed as a secular holiday, we hav no desire to discourage. The enjoyment of a holiday as a holy day by religious people is their right. If they choose to spend the whole twenty-four hours in prayer, praise, or any form of worship, we would defend their right to do so.

OUR POSITION SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.

The Holy Ghost is alleged to declare through the Apostle Paul: "One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom. xiv, 5). "Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days" (Col. ii, 16).

We hav no objection to the roast turkey, but we do not want it to be stuffed with creed. We hav no objection to pumpkin pie, but protest against its being seasoned with theology.

The holiday is all right if appointed without reference to religion; all wrong when interfering with, dictating, or even suggesting religious observances, doctrins, or exercises.

NO HARM TO RECOMMEND RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCES.

It is claimed that thanksgiving proclamations do not enforce but simply recommend a day of thanksgiving to Almighty God.

Thomas Jefferson said: "The government has no right to indirectly assume an authority over religious exercises, which the constitution has directly precluded it from. I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercises or that the general government should be invested with power to effect any uniformity of time or matter among them. Fasting and prayer are religious exercises, the enjoining them an act of disciplin.

"Every religious society has a right to determin for itself the times for these exercises, and this right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has deposited it."

Madison declared: "The broadest principles of the Constitution would entirely preclude the chief executiv from thus interfering in the religious affairs of the nation.

"Notwithstanding the general progress, there remains a strong bias toward the old error that without some sort of alliance or coalition between government and religion neither can be duly supported. Such, indeed, is the tendency to such a coalition and such its corrupting influence on both the parties that the danger cannot be too carefully guaranteed against."

No man has any right to prescribe, and no servant of the people, in his official character as an officer of the government, has any duty, right, or business to set apart, or to request the people to set apart, any time for any religious observance, either prayer, praise, feast, or fast.

To do so is to connect the state with religion, to elevate the cross above the flag.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ALL.

Why should one class of citizens be preferred to all others that their religious belief shall be pandered to by the government and the belief of other citizens snubbed or ignored?

The sectarian character of thanksgiving proclamations is shown by the fact that should the president or the governor of the state happen at some time to adapt his proclamation to the Jewish faith, and recommend religious persons to assemble in the synagogs for public prayer for the coming of the messiah; or to the Spiritualist faith, and recommend that all the people meet in séance circles and ask advice of the spirits, what a howl of indignation would go forth.

Such inappropriateness will always be less evident to those whose mode of faith the proclamation conforms to, than to those whose religious scruples it solemnly insults.

But the accident of bias in no way affects the official impertinence and gross injustice of the act.

WE OUGHT TO DEVOTE A DAY TO THANK GOD FOR HIS BLESSING.

What right has the president or the governor of the state to decide the question of who is the true and only God?

Our state constitution in its preamble reads, "grateful to the supreme ruler of the universe;" the educated and intelligent people of the state of Washington recognize force and matter as the supreme rulers of the universe.

Certain it is, if gravity, electricity, magnetism, and chemical affinity are real forces, eternally inherent in matter, then of necessity the Gods—the Brahmas, Josses, Yofs, Juggernauts, and Jehovahs—must one and all be imaginary beings.

The only God we hav any reverence for is the God we know nothing about; once well posted on the nature, character, and origin of any God, we at once hav no further use for him.

WE KNOW ENOUGH TO SAY "THANK YOU" WITHOUT PROMPTING.

Waiving the question of which, of many, is the only true God—if the people of Washington hav occasion of gratitude that should induce them to giv thanks, don't they know enough to do so without having to be instructed by the governor of the state or the president of the nation?

What a hideous mockery is this national day of thanksgiving. Under existing circumstances how many hav especial cause of thanksgiving?

God is declared to be the creator of all things. Shall the man whose hops are rendered well-nigh worthless through the ravages of the hop-louse devote a day of thanksgiving to God for having created such extra swarms of the foul, destructiv pests?

The toiling, health-broken farmers—failure of crops forced them to mortgage their farms, now the ruinous interest and heavy taxes leave them hopelessly bankrupt.

When banks get in tightened straits, the government comes to their relief. The funds in the treasury are the people's money; they hav, through Congress, the right to issue fiat money which could be safely loaned to the needy on first mortgage of real estate, at two per cent per annum, for ten years. This would enable thousands of farmers to make success, improve their farms; the money in circulation would make good times for all. But bankers and capitalists are opposed to the government loaning money to the needy at two per cent. It would stop their robbing people of twenty to eighty per cent.

Should not the farmers devote a day of thanksgiving to God for his justice, love, and mercy in thus making the poor poorer and the rich richer?

Daniel Webster declared: "Liberty cannot long endure in any country where the tendency of legislation is to concentrate wealth in the hands of the few."

In the last few years the additions to the great fortunes of successful speculators are enormous. There has been added to the

Vanderbilt estate	$30,000,000
Russell Sage	10,000,000
Rockefeller	20,000,000
Jay Gould	20,000,000
Sid. Dillon	10,000,000
James R. Keene	8,000,000
Total	$98,000,000

These half dozen men got that amount. Not one of them earned or produced one single dollar of it. Wage-workers and producers had to earn it, but they hav been robbed of it.

I admit each of that half dozen capitalists might feel to devote one day of thanksgiving to his almighty (dollar).

But shall the robbed, the oppressed, the half-starved wage-worker, the real producer, spend a day in thanksgiving to God who rules, who doeth all things well, who is so careful of sparrows and the stray hairs of our heads, yet lets the wives and poor innocent little babies of the honest toiler starve?

Shall the disabled veteran, the private in the ranks who fought the battles and endured the privations, who contracted disease that disqualified him for work, shall he spend a day in thanksgiving that after Garfield died Congress passed a bill pensioning his widow $5,000 per year during her life?

She had $300,000 in government bonds, the result of a subscription. Garfield was insured for $50,000, which was promptly paid her. She received $20,000 salary for the unoccupied year. All this independent of the Garfield estate of $30,000.

Congress votes this already wealthy woman a pension of $13 69 every day in the year. The disabled veteran, who fought through the entire war, wounded so as to be unable to gain a livelihood, can not get sixty-nine cents a day. Surely he and his suffering wife should spend a day in thanksgiving to a God of justice who doeth all things well. "The Lord will provide."

Between 1850 and 1870, during which time both houses of Congress were especially endowed with wisdom direct from God in answer to the daily well-paid prayers of his ministers, Congress gave away to wealthy railroad corporations 208,344,268 acres of public lands; this would hav given 3,472,404 men a farm of sixty acres each.

Foreign aristocrats, who hav no thought of ever making this country their home, now own 50,000,000 acres of our land. Duke of Cleveland, 106,000 acres; duke of Devonshire, 148,629 acres; duke of Northumberland, 191,480 acres; these three dukes of England own nearly 500,000 acres.

The thousands of homeless wanderers certainly should spend a day of thanksgiving, should heed the recommendation of the thanksgiving proclamation and assemble at their respectiv places of worship to giv thanks to God, their loving heavenly father, for his overruling providence. Perhaps they all would only their clothes are not good enough—not of the fashionable cut—and the sexton would drive them out or giv them in custody to the police as vagrants. Still, they should most certainly spend the day in thanksgiving; did not Jesus declare it is "blessed to be poor?"

The grasping avarice of corporations has ground down the wages of their employees till in despair they strike. They and their families starve. They hav dared to assert their manhood. Well they can spend a day in thanksgiving, for they hav nothing else to do. Let them offer especial thanks for the blessed gospel, the inspiring, helpful words of the blessed savior, "Be content with your wages" (Luke iii, 14).

A man awakes on the morning of thanksgiving day and discovers that the saintly pillar of the church, the man who converted him to God, the man whom, because of his piety, he trusted with all his hard-earned savings, has fled to Canada and left him and his motherless babes to beggary. Surely he would delight to spend the day in thanksgiving to the all-seeing, all-merciful God.

Another man left with little helpless children, worse than orphaned—the minister that he loved and trusted has run away with his wife. The minister who so loudly and fiercely denounced Infidels, who loved to dwell on the recantation of Voltaire, Paine, and others on their death-beds; who so vividly pictured the wickedness, heartless cruelty, and infamy of Infidels, has left his own wife and four children in a state of utter destitution and run off with the wife of his best friend—imitating that pattern saint David, the man after God's own heart.

Shall the dishonored husband, the deserted wife, the helpless, disgraced children, all unite in devoting the day to thanksgiving to God? Hav they not especial cause of thankfulness as they read the assurance in his holy word that God himself was the author of their misery: "I make peace and create evil: I the Lord do all these things" (Isa. xlv, 7)?

"All religions, gods, prophets, messiahs, or saints were created by the credulous fancy of men who had not attained the full growth of their intellectual faculties. God, once installed, became the cause, the arbitrator of all things. Man was nothing, God was all, and man has bowed down and become the debased slave of those who pretend to speak of and for him by authority."

There is nothing that tends to perpetuate the weakness of humanity more than religion. Men hav been taught for ages that they were dependent upon God for all they hav. "Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought of your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. . . . Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed? (for after all these things do the gentiles seek:) for your heavenly father knoweth that ye hav need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. vi, 25–33).

This kind of teaching must be corrected; it is false! Man is dependent upon man; no God ever did or ever will help him. Be he ever so good no God will reward, feed, clothe, or help him; be he ever so bad no God will blame him. What he needs is to escape his own condemnation.

RELY ON SELF, NOT ON MYTHS AND BUGABOOS.

In order to develop an independent spirit in man it is necessary to increase his responsibility. Man must be taught to rely upon his own strength, upon the powers of his own body and mind. He must learn his relations to nature and abide by the laws of his being. He must be grounded in the great truth that if he would hav anything he must earn and deserve it, that he can never obtain anything by praying. Human destiny follows human conduct.

The old absurdity that man is responsible to and wholly dependent on God cannot be proved. There are no facts to warrant such a notion; on the contrary, man is responsible to himself. It is this truth that is calculated to elevate and ennoble human life. Let human beings be convinced that they are not what God but what their heredity has made them, that they are responsible to themselvs and their fellow-men for what they do, and they will be more worthy of respect and liv more worthy lives.

Let every genuin Liberal use every lawful means to put an end to the mockery of thanksgiving proclamations.

We will furnish free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. A Freethinker of good address, man or woman, out of work, could make good salary selling this book in any town of fairly Liberal inhabitants.

On the Pacific Coast.

The Special Agency for the Pacific Coast of The Truth Seeker is at 838 Howard street, San Francisco, Cal., where the paper and our publications can be found and subscriptions renewed. Mr. S. P. Putnam, also, will receive subscriptions and renewals.

News and Notes.

Spangle used to be one of the largest distributing points in Washington before the advent of the railroad. A vast territory received mail and supplies from the place. Sometimes twenty stage-coaches were here on an evening and crowds of passengers. That glory has now departed and Spangle is a quiet railroad village. There is a fine wheat country about it, and over half a million bushels of grain are shipped from this station yearly. I find a comfortable stopping-place at the hotel of C. W. Frick, who, like many of our Western pioneers, has been over the world in various wanderings, and, having his eyes open, has lost all confidence in theology and the churches. I meet plenty of friends at this rendezvous—Julius Schure, of Waverly, Winfield Keevy, Mat and Fred Buckmaster, G. T. McFarland, and others. I gave the first Freethought lecture in this place. The house was full and the reception every way most favorable. Mr. Joseph Henrich is the main worker here. THE TRUTH SEEKER list was increased. Knuth and West H. Neidringhaus are enrolled with Mr. Henrich. The busy season prevented many from attendance. There are two or three forlorn churches at Spangle. The orthodox do not make a very flourishing appearance.

I lecture at Spangle Tuesday, September 15th. On Wednesday following I go to Rosalia, and here the "old guard" is ready—Peter Proff, A. Dorsey, William Fisk, Sam Avery, and others. I giv two lectures. The churches hav a prayer-meeting, but this is adjourned on account of slimness of attendance. I find a clergyman here, the Rev. A. Y. Skee, who has the courage of his convictions. He arose to reply at the close of my last lecture and was granted a cordial hearing. He seemed to be in earnest and made some good points. He declared that he was a Presbyterian egg hatched under a Baptist hen and was now a Methodist chicken. To this I replied that by a further evolution he might become a Freethought man. Another point was that he weighed one hundred and seventy-five pounds. My rejoinder was that I weighed one hundred and eighty pounds. I therefore had the weight of the argument. Again he said, pointing to a new carriage—for the lecture was given in a large agricultural implement and wagon storehouse—"I can make a carriage, can you?" To this I remarked that I could make a pair of shoes and he could not. These, in the main, were the theological pointers of my critic. The deeper aspects of the question were not touched upon and time did not allow me to advance them on my own account. I therefore challenged my jolly reverend gentleman to several nights' debate at Rosalia, in order that the pros and cons might be more fully elucidated. He accepted my challenge, and unless the Rev. Mr. Skee shows the white feather there will be a debate this winter at Rosalia.

Wednesday was a blustering day and the dust rolled in clouds over the hills and vales, but in spite of this, with Mr. A. Dorsey and Henry Ferguson I paid a visit to the ranch of William Fisk, and here we enjoyed ourselvs in good Freethought fellowship for several hours. Mr. Fisk is a Liberal with every fiber of his being and is always a generous contributor to the work. His two sisters liv with him, gentle and orthodox, but that does not disturb the harmony of the fireside. Here is philosophic calm. Fisk does not hav the slightest trouble about the next world, and as for this world he gets the cream of it in a sensible fashion. He says if he had a million dollars he'd spend it all for Freethought, and I guess he would. I had a fine opportunity to view the country surrounding Rosalia. Abundant crops are produced here. The harvest, however, is not so good this year as usual. The rains were rather late. This is an excellent region for fruits. I visited Calhoun's orchard on my return from Fisk's. Apples, pears, prunes, and plums are plenty and rich in flavor. Peaches, also, in certain localities are successfully cultivated. This is a magnificent country—illimitable acreage, with a fair climate and wealth of soil. Only a few years ago not a house was here, not a fence, and now the villages are springing up like magic, and the march of industry is indeed brilliant over these rolling hills. The future of this great country is alluring.

The Rosalia Rustler still rustles. I. E. Nessly is editor and proprietor. He is not afraid to say a good word for the Liberal.

Peter Proff and his family are in the front ranks of Freethought. His son is about to take a trip to New Zealand, and the Liberal friends there will find him a stanch comrade.

C. D. Lack gave welcome at his homestead. He is a bachelor but thinks on the whole that two would be better than one. He never fails to do his level best for the cause.

Henry Ferguson, W. E. Schneider, Robert Ehrich, Michael Menli, Robert Orr, are on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

James Whaley and others were present from Plaza.

I was pleased to meet with Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin. Mrs. Baldwin is an intelligent and cultivated lady, an earnest advocate of Liberal principles, and can be eloquent on the platform if need be.

Mayor Terry maintains order and deals impartially with the Liberal and the orthodox. He introduced me at the lectures.

Rosalia is a go-ahead place. It has a good newspaper, good schools, and the Liberal and advanced element prevails.

On to Oakesdale, Friday, September 18th. Well, Oakesdale has had a curious time since I was here last. I might write a novel out of the remarkable events which hav occurred. It has been like a stage play, and the dramatic surprises of real life make "truth stranger than fiction."

In the first place, there has been a desperate effort on the part of Christians to run this town and drive out the Liberals, with murder if need be. That there was an attempt to assassinate Mr. George Comegys admits of but little doubt. Whether the better element of the church saw the actual outcome cannot be known, but as a matter of fact the preachers of Oakesdale hav sanctioned bloodshed in the endeavor to carry out their plans. The spirit of the Dark Ages has shown itself in the transactions of the clergy. Mr. William Howard was threatened with arrest by the city marshal without any legal authority whatsoever. Mr. Chadwick, of Colfax, mayor of that city, Mr. Howard's counsel, informed him of the illegality of the marshal's warrants. Mr. Comegys coincided with this view as a matter of law. This was declared by the city council to be "incendiary advice," and the marshal was ordered by the city council to take Mr. Comegys "dead or alive," for expressing an opinion which has since been declared by the courts to be good law. However, the city council did not care for law—they were representativs of the churches. Mr. Howard was arrested and thrust into jail without the slightest legal authority. He consulted with Mr. Comegys. Afterward as Mr. Comegys was peaceably walking the streets with a friend, Mr. Luke Walford, without any warning the marshal and two deputies stood in front with drawn pistols. Mr. Comegys flung up his unarmed hand and exclaimed, "Hold on there!" But scarcely were the words out of his mouth when the pistols were fired. Mr. Comegys leaped into a saloon near by and prepared to defend himself. One young man was shot in the leg. For a while mob-law prevailed. The Christians were rampant. They rushed to the back of the saloon endeavoring to get a sight of Comegys. "Shoot him!" was the cry. In the street a minister of the gospel was crying, "Arrest him if it takes six lives!" However, the minister carefully kept himself in the rear. It was his voice only that was portentous. By this time M. M. Walsh was at the side of Comegys with a pistol. The Christians began to realize there was danger and that it wouldn't do to press matters. Comegys's friends rallied in force. To prevent further bloodshed a compromise was effected. It was agreed by the Christians not to arrest Mr. Comegys that day. Afterward, however, by a sly trick, the Christians made an attempt on Comegys, but were prevented by the determination of his friends. The Christians found themselvs in a tremendous difficulty. Under the guise of law they had created and headed a mob, and were liable themselvs to the action of the courts. Mr. Howard was released on writ of habeas corpus. Mr. Comegys's three assailants were arrested, tried, and convicted of manslaughter. The end is not yet. The young man who was injured and who will probably be a cripple for life has sued the city for $50,000 damages. It is worthy of note that during all his sickness not a Christian has visited him or offered him help, although he was a perfectly innocent party. An attempt was made to induce the young man to perjure himself and swear that Mr. Comegys had a pistol in his hand when the shooting was done. This the young man refused to do, for he said that Mr. Comegys had no pistol in his hand. After this the Christians ignored the injured man. He would not lie for the glory of God. Mass meeting after mass meeting was held by the Christians to back up the criminals, and the clergymen exhorted at these meetings and nearly $3,000 were raised by the church to defend the would-be assassins. Never was the cruel and cowardly spirit of Christianity more manifest than in these transactions. However, the retribution came upon these fanatics most sudden and terrible. The tables are completely turned and all the Christians of Oakesdale to-day are covered with shame and confusion. They hang their heads. The world looks upon their disgrace. They are a by-word and a laughing-stock from one end of the continent to the other. They richly deserve their tremendous punishment.

I cannot giv the denouement of this drama. I must rely upon the Spokane spokesman to do justice to this romantic affair:

OAKESDALE, Sept. 18.—[Special.]—The latest that can be learned here to-night in regard to the Gilstrap affair is that the enterprising young editor whose Mormon tendencies are the talk of this city, has been overhauled at Helena and is being brought back here to answer for his misdeeds.

Nothing has ever happened in this place which so intensely wrought up the citizens. The excitement caused by the organization of a vigilance committee a year ago, and the wild indignation recently caused by the attempted assassination of Mr. Comegys, were but a murmur compared with the roar of anger that now goes up from the citizens of Oakesdale over the villainous conduct of this smooth man Gilstrap. People are wild to think that they hav treated such a creature as a man. Since his arrival here he has posed as an editor and educator of the people. It is thought that it will not be safe for the authorities to bring him back to Oakesdale. Aside from the violence he might suffer at the hands of a mob, the fathers, brothers, and husbands of his many victims will not hesitate to kill him on sight.

The list of Gilstrap's amours swells daily. The developments are astounding. Girls and married women whose reputation has hitherto been beyond question, it now transpires hav been intimate with him.

And the matter does not end there. So good was Gilstrap's standing in this community that he was welcomed in many homes. In view of the developments of the past day or two, rumor does not spare a household where Gilstrap was intimate. The result is disastrous and suspicious in many of Oakesdale's families. Husbands look suspiciously at their wives; fathers and mothers eye their daughters in a questioning manner and in every home where the trail of the serpent is supposed to be, there is a quiet, domestic investigation going on.

Gilstrap is a slight-built, rather good-looking young fellow. He was owner and editor of the Oakesdale Sun and the Alliance Advocate, published at the place, but never displayed more than average ability. He was, however, a devout church-member, led the choir, and was superintendent of the Sabbath-school. It was through his piety that he became acquainted with his victims. The unfortunate girls were all members of his Sabbath-school. While the pious, white-cravated young superintendent was interpreting the word of God to the flock around him he was selecting ewe lambs to sacrifice to his base passions. During seasons of revivals he was exceedingly activ in exhorting and converting sinners. In this way he gained the attention of the married women. It is said that one woman has confessed that the occasion of her first yielding to Gilstrap was one day when he made a call on her for the purpose of converting her. While they were on their knees praying Gilstray made improper advances. Later he prayed again, blasphemously calling upon the almighty to bless his actions.

I need add nothing to what the secular press publishes. The picture is complete. As an exhibition of Christian malignancy, Christian duplicity, Christian hypocrisy, Christian brutality, Christian crime, the history of Oakesdale for the last year beats the records. But what the Christians hav done at Oakesdale is only the logical outcome of the damnable religion of the churches. It is what all the churches will do, giv them a chance. They are savage at heart, and so is the gospel they preach.

Liberalism is on top at Oakesdale. It has won the victory by force of circumstances. It has proved itself to be law-abiding and on the side of justice. It has vindicated itself by a fair trial. I gave one lecture to a full house, although the weather was stormy. I was glad to meet the brave, true friends here who hav stood the brunt of the battle so nobly. It took courage, wisdom, devotion, and resolute spirit to meet the perils of the situation. Thomas Secrist, M. M. Walsh, William Howard, J. W. McCune, and their confrères are worthy of admiration. They hav maintained our colors splendidly. I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Weaver, whom I formerly met in the ranks of Freethought at Auburn, Ind. Again I am in the cheerful household of Mr. and Mrs. Secrist, and around the hospitable table of Mr. and Mrs. McClure. I find that woman can see the dawning day outside the shadow of the churches. W. O. Hadsell, M. M. Walsh, William Howard, are on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I was pleased to meet with John E. Welm, an enthusiastic worker—a reader also of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who aided in the lecture at Spokane, although not able to be present.

I must leave my account of Palouse City until next week. I had a splendid time there. It is a banner town on this frontier. But it is important that the remarkable events at Oakesdale should be put on record as far as possible. It was a decisiv and dramatic contest between Liberalism and Orthodoxy, and Liberalism has made a brilliant success.

Another great victory has been achieved. The attorney-general of the state has declared that the reading of the Bible in the public schools is unconstitutional. I forward the Spokesman containing his argument. It is able and an indication of immense advance in the minds of the people. It is a state paper of the first importance to our cause.

Spokane, Sept. 21, 1891. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Reflections from San Francisco.

Rev. Minot J. Savage has been creating a sensation on the coast by his radical utterances from the rostrum and pulpit. Crowds of people attend his talks and the daily papers hav published lengthy reports of his remarks. Work of this kind reaches a class of people that would otherwise remain in almost complete ignorance of radical ideas. There is need of more such men as Mr. Savage, and more such work as he is doing. The ranks of Liberalism are filled from the camps of orthodoxy and these cannot be more effectivly reached than through the efforts of such men as Minot J. Savage.

I was much pleased as well as surprised to receive recently from an old friend an aid to the cause of Freethought in the shape of a $10 bill, accompanied by the following interesting words: "Would gladly add another cipher to the saw-buck rag of Uncle Sam if I could afford it. I giv you paper money, thinking you can put your trust in it in preference to the silver dollar whose trust is based 'in God.' . . . Lay it up where neither moth nor rust will corrupt it—that is, circulate it where it will continue a good work in liberalizing public sentiment and aid in pulling down the strongholds of error, superstition, and intolerance, and destroying the power of the priesthood." I can only say, thanks. The favor is gratefully accepted.

In Livermore, a town numbering its inhabitants into the thousands, lying about forty miles from the eastern edge of Alameda county, and perhaps lying about some other trivial matters; also booming into notice as a possible suburb of Oakland—that is, if reports of this "Athens of the Pacific coast" are worthy of credence—the proud possessor of two weekly newspapers, four churches, and a score or two of Freethinkers who are not backward in coming forward, not to mention a large number of people who believe in the principles of Secularism. The church influence recently effected a combination of forces—a sort of temporary consolidation as it were, to impress upon careless sinners the necessity of "coming to Jesus." The best of local talent reinforced by a traveling evangelist, who claimed to hav seen and talked with the spirit of Jesus and was therefore possessed of unusually favorable qualifications for the duties of such a position, worked for a dozen days with unflinching energy. A convert and one-half—a woman and a child—were added to the list of the saved. These revivalists brought their best arguments to bear upon Mr. M. S. Palmer, a veteran Freethinker, but he compelled them to retire in confusion. The sturdy Freethinker did not allow them time to catch their breath, and they gave up trying to convert him and devoted their time to street-singing and pulpit-pounding, with the result as stated above, world unceasing, so might it be.

Speaking of the silly antics of the representativs of the family Simiadæ, did you ever notice that the "lords of creation" are addicted to a similar habit? I am forcibly reminded of this by the recent words of a London Theosophist of eminence who in all sobriety and earnestness says that he has received a most impressing communication from the late Madam Blavatsky. She complains that she is most unfortunate since her arrival in Devachan. She has lost all her clothes on the passage and is wandering about the meads of Asphodel in a sad state. Were it not for the uncertain means of communication between the globe upon which we are exhibited and the present address of Madam Blavatsky, it would be proper to raise a fund and send to her relief. But probably the climate is mild there and, like the late lamented Balmaceda, she could not get chilly even if she wanted to.

I hav been spending some of the shady hours of the day lately in looking over "exchanges," a task which, while it might be made very pleasant by putting a pretty girl within range of the eye looking over the paper, is generally somewhat tiresome. There are several papers published which one may study over for a long time without gaining much knowledge, and from one of these I will clip a gem or two which the writers hav had put in type and left to the ignorance of their readers. An advocate of the "hollow globe" theory supports his position by the statement that when standing on a pier thirty feet high and observing a similar pier ten miles distant he caused several yachts, the masts of which were not over twenty-five feet high, to sail from pier to pier, and in no case did the vessels obscure the distant pier. I may not possess as much perceptiv power as some persons, for I fail to comprehend how a mast twenty-five feet high could cover a space thirty feet in hight, not to mention the added five feet or more of the observer's person.

"Women are the ravens that feed Elijah." This is scriptural enough to achieve success anywhere. That is, it is sufficiently ambiguous to permit of any interpretation which may suit the reader. But the writer, not realizing that this was the proper point to tarry, that he should leave further amplification to the taste and inclinations of his audience, adds: "The raven is a dark and stupid bird which can carry a message although not able to understand its import." In making this ungallant assertion he boldly courts destruction, and I am inclined to think it not unmerited.

F. L. BROWNE.

In the Middle States.

My Lecture Trip.

Leaving Shreve, I was taken across country a distance of seven miles to Nashville, where I was down for two lectures. This is the first time in the history of this town that Freethought meetings were held and Freethought lectures given, and when the announcements were first made they fell like a thunderbolt among the orthodox. From the first means were taken to prevent the lectures, if possible; desperate measures were to be resorted to but they would carry their schemes to a successful issue. "Henfruit" was freely talked of; steps were also taken to deprive us of a place of meeting. But their efforts all ended in smoke. "They may perhaps smoke themselvs some day." For our meetings were held, and successfully, too. There were, at the least computation, one-third of the entire population in attendance (about four hundred), and stranger still, one-half of my audience were ladies, showing that in Nashville they are not (mentally) the weaker sex. We experienced no disturbance whatever beyond the blowing of a steam whistle attached to a thrashing machine which some one had placed underneath the window of the meeting-room and for a time succeeded in making a greater noise than myself.

Thus the first lectures in Nashville were very successful; not an empty seat could be found on the second night. During my stay here I was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Dan Plouts, by whose efforts, assisted by H. Kircer and others, the lectures were arranged. I was very loth to leave their pleasant little farm-house, situated in a luxurious valley about two miles from town. Their kindness I shall never forget. James Cross, of Black Creek, drove over and presided at both meetings. There are a number of earnest Freethinkers in this little town, but they cannot organize as yet, having no palpable means of existence. Alas for the national organization, which should be able to render assistance and support to such places as these. And there are many such in our land; in fact, their name is legion. With a little judicious administration carried out in the right direction, it is impossible to estimate the good that would result therefrom.

From Nashville I went back to Shreve, hoping that the local sky-pilots had thought well to accept the challenge I had made them to debate, but my hopes were not realized, they, thinking no doubt that discretion was the better part of valor, declining to come forward and defend that which they were paid to preach. "These parsons are wise." They know on which side their bread is buttered—that is, "both sides" as a general rule.

I again resumed my journey to Alliance, where I was advertised for two more lectures, which were given in the Independent church. They were successful in every respect, thanks to the combined efforts of D. W. and R. G. Smith. The lectures were made more attractiv by a short though lively debate.

I had not long to stay here, for after the lecture I had to prepare for a midnight journey to Quincy, O., reaching there about noon the next day. At the depot I was met by James Madison Putnam, an ardent and earnest Freethinker whose hospitality I enjoyed during my visit here, and who for many years has served as a county official. Previous to my advent in Quincy, the Freethinkers had been in a state of anxiety and despair, for, with that consistency so characteristic of Christians in general, they had completely ignored the divine injunction of their master "to resist not evil," declaring that Infidelity was an evil that could not be forwarded in their midst. They refused to let us hav a hall to meet in, having control thereof; sad and gloomy was the outlook; eagerly they chuckled at every ray of hope, but only to be hurled back with disappointments. Hope had changed to despair, a dark cloud hung o'er their hearts like a pall, when suddenly from out of the darkness shot a bright ray of light, which increased as it approached; and with the glowing brightness each true heart leaped with joy.

Mr. George Dormire had nobly sprung to the rescue, bringing with him the Bible deeds of an old school-house which he had purchased at Carysville, six miles away, and dedicated the same to the Freethinkers of the district. All hail to Mr. George Dormire. Such an action is well deserving the thanks—not prayers—of all Freethinkers. "When I was in trouble he did comfort me." The lectures were given in the old school-house, now a Freethought hall, having been purged of the Holy Ghost. They were well attended. The principals and teachers of the surrounding schools were among the audience, who listened attentivly but had nothing to say, as usual. There are some good live Liberals here, including besides those mentioned P. H. McCrosky, J. Stockwell, W. Duncan, and others. With the possibilities they hav before them they will organize a Secular society here at no late date.

I left here Wednesday morning for North Baltimore, where I had to lecture the same night, arriving in town just an hour before the time of opening. It took me some time to get located, so that finally I had to mount the platform dusty and travel-stained. The handsome Opera House had been engaged for the meeting, capable of holding about eight hundred people, but, alas! my audience scarcely numbered one-sixteenth of its holding capacity, being by far the smallest attendance I hav encountered during my experience. This was due in a great measure to a lack of advertising. I met here several good and earnest Freethinkers, among them being S. M. Bower; C. Germann and family, of Bloomdale, who had traveled eight miles to hear the lecture; also Dr. Eaton. I hope for better luck next time I visit here. Here endeth the second lesson. Friends in Iowa, Nebraska, and Colorado desiring my services to lecture are requested to address me in care of E. A. Stevens, 498 West Madison street, Chicago.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Lectures and Meetings.

S. P. PUTNAM'S lecture appointments for October are as follows: Grant's Pass, Ore., October 7th, 8th; San Francisco, 11th; Sacramento, 18th. Will lecture in California through the months of October, November, December, and January, state convention January 29th.

THE Radical Club will suspend after October 1st, and the Liberal Club will resume its usual Friday evening meetings October 2d at 220 East 15th street. Mr. W. C. Owen will open the course of political debates during October with a lecture on "Socialism in Present Politics."

J. G. HERTWIG, P. O. box 413, Washington, D. C., intends to lecture during the forthcoming fall and winter on the following subjects: 1. "National Taxation," opposing the present customs and internal revenue systems of the United States and advocating a not graduated income tax in their stead, for raising the revenue necessary for the support of the government. 2. "Free Coinage," advocating free and unlimited coinage, from American silver, of a temporary silver dollar, correct as to its bullion value, and, as soon as it can be accomplished, an international agreement as to fixed ratio between gold and silver as monetary metals. 3. "Sunday Laws," energetically opposing such laws, as violating the Constitution of the United States, and, in addition, expounding the other demands of Liberalism. He urgently and sincerely solicits engagements for these lectures.

THE Spokane, Wash., Spokesman reports Mr. Putnam's recent lecture in that city as follows: S. P. Putnam, president of the Liberal Union of California, delivered a lecture in the Unitarian church last evening on "Liberalism and Freethought." Mr. Putnam is a rapid but pleasing speaker, and his large audience seemed to thoroughly appreciate the discourse. He showed that he was well-read on all matters pertaining to his subject, and at times his eloquence was such as to elicit long-continued applause from his listeners. Mr. Putnam took the stand that the people ought to fight every encroachment of the church upon the state. He considered the Sabbath day and Sunday entirely different, as the Sabbath was the Lord's day and originated with Constantine in the year 321. In speaking of the Sunday law Mr. Putnam said: "It is urged by some that we need a national Sunday law to make the state Sunday law effectiv. We ask why so? What is the need of Sunday laws at all? What are they for? Are they for the religious or irreligious? Law in civil government, whether civil law or any other, means compulsion. Are Sunday laws to compel those who believe in keeping Sunday to keep the day, or to compel those who do not believe in keeping Sunday to keep it?" Mr. Putnam called attention to the effort being made to close the World's Fair on Sunday. He considered it an unjust thing to do. It would be an encroachment upon the religious liberties and a tendency toward the uniting of the church and state. He did not believe in any more law on Sunday than on any other day in the week. He believed in it as a day of rest and recreation, but not a day where men should be compelled to go to church and listen to dogmas that do not interest them. He said California was the only state that did not hav Sunday laws. For the national Congress to pass Sunday laws would be a rank injustice. Mr. Putnam closed his lecture as follows: "The enactment of a Sunday law in the fourth century united church and state. The same kind of legislation now will do the same thing. Against such measures every loyal citizen and every lover of civil and religious liberty should raise his voice in protestation and warning." All through the lecture Mr. Putnam was listened to with the greatest interest, and it is understood that a branch of the Liberal Union will be started in this city.

THE most wonderful part of this infernal enterprise [war] is, that each chief of the murderers causes his colors to be blessed, and solemnly invokes God before he goes to exterminate his neighbors. If a chief has only the fortune to kill two or three thousand men, he does not thank God for it; but when he has exterminated about ten thousand men by fire and sword, and, to complete the work, some town has been leveled with the ground, they then sing a long song in four parts, composed in a language unknown to all who hav fought, and moreover replete with barbarism. The same song serves for marriages and births as well as for murders.—Voltaire.

The World's Fair on Sunday.

The following dispatch, received the other day in Chicago, presents a new phase of the Sunday-closing question:

WEATHERFORD, TEX., Sept. 9, 1891.

BOARD OF CONTROL COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION: One hundred thousand Texans protest against the Sunday closing of the World's Fair. The day of fanaticism is passed.

NORTHWEST TEXAS FAIR ASSOCIATION.

"This," remarks the Chicago Journal, "will probably prove a starter for hundreds of such protests. So far but one side of the question has been heard, the advocates against the opening. Now the other side has its inning."

OFFICIAL OPINION IN ST LOUIS.

From the St. Louis Chronicle.

Deputy United States Collector Frederick W. H. Wiesehahn: "Certainly, let it be as open on Sunday as upon Monday. If necessary, let the Fair management hire an extra force of employees to keep it open on the Sabbath."

Capt. James H. Steger, secretary to Postmaster Harlow: "I believe that the Fair should be kept open all the year around. I do not believe in the sentiment that kills its cat on Monday for catching a rat on Sunday. The Fair is for all classes and conditions of citizens, and should be run open to all parties irrespectiv of religious belief or religious unbelief."

"By all means," replied United States Prosecuting Attorney George D. Reynolds. "The Fair should be open every day in the year. I do not wish to appear opposing the church in any degree, but do not believe that the Bible means that mankind shall eschew all enjoyment on the Sabbath. The book says, 'Thou shalt not labor on the Sabbath,' and attending the Fair is not laboring by a long sight. Let the church goer go to church in the morning and attend the Fair in the afternoon."

"I hope that I am a good churchman," replied Assistant Postmaster Beverly A. Sturgeon, "but really can see no reason for closing the Fair on Sunday any more than upon Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday. There is so much innocent enjoyment to be derived for all classes that it would really be a pity to exclude the thousands on Sunday who are unable to go on any other day. I think that no man is the worse for attending a Fair like the Columbian on the Sabbath days. He may be just as good and just as devout by attending both the church and the Fair upon the same day."

Circuit Clerk A. P. Selby and United States Commissioner Lester Crawford were engaged in conversation when the Chronicle reporter chipped in with the question. "Of course it should be kept open on Sundays!" exclaimed Mr. Crawford. "Of course it should not," returned Mr. Selby with spirit. "Giv the poor laborers a chance, I say," continued Crawford. "The Fair is for them as much as it is for anybody else. If you had to work every day in the week you'd want it open." "Very true," responded Selby, "but every employer of labor will giv their men one or two days off every month to enjoy it. There is no use in desecrating the Sabbath when there are six days in the week for people to attend. Besides that, the employees of the Fair want a little rest." "Oh, yes. But then you're wrong on the labor question. I'll wager that there ain't one employer in a hundred who would giv their men those two days off. Even if they would, who would pay the poor man's expenses while he enjoyed the Exposition? Their wages—that is, many hundred of them—are just sufficient to carry them along." "The employer would pay them for their day off. The government does it right along, doesn't it? It givs its employees holidays when they want them." "The ordinary employer is altogether different from the United States government, you'd find, if you worked by the day." "St. Louis employers would, just the same. If the Fair were held here they would be too glad to do it. Don't you remember that the Exposition managers here had the same question up before them, and when it was put squarely before the people the people decided to hav it closed on Sundays. Likewise the Fair management here. You will find that it is the same way there at Chicago when the time comes."

ORGANIZED LABOR'S PROTEST.

Resolutions adopted by the Workingmen of Minneapolis.

Whereas, An attempt is being made by a group of self-constituted representativs of institutional religion, led by Don Quixote Elliott P. Shepard and Heresy Hunter Francis L. Patton, to induce the World's Fair at Chicago to close the doors of the Fair on Sunday, thus compelling a public and official recognition of the church's "holy day" and depriving three-fourths of the people of the republic of the opportunity to derive instruction from witnessing, if they so desire, the products of industry and art on the one day of the week when they are free from labor; and

Whereas, In urging this action upon the board, these self-important individuals present a memorial, couched in the language of cant and fiction, in support of their interference with the liberties of three-fourths of the people, and

Whereas, The institution represented by these meddling pietists has not been in the past and is not now the friend and champion of the world's workers; whether we look to one division or another, the attitude of the church as an institution to the laboring masses, as manifested in the utterances of conspicuous representativs, is the same. Cardinal Gibbons, of the Catholic church, says the woes of the poor are a part of the divine plan to giv the rich an opportunity to be generous; Bishop Vincent, of the Methodist church, denounces "foreign" workingmen as "rascals" and cringes to "foreign" capitalists; Heresy Hunter Patton's ultimation is that "if the workingman and his family [who make a World's Fair possible] cannot see the World's Fair on any other day than Sunday, so much the worse for the workingman," and Rev. Marion D. Shutter, a representativ of the church that affirms the salvation of all men in the next world, sneeringly refers to those who try to save men here as "labor reformers rum-soaked and smelling of kerosene." In brief, the church as an institution is arrayed against a world-wide movement for the economic freedom of the wealth producers and upholds the tyranny of capital; it blacklists within its organization men of broad human sympathy and courageous utterance and dishonors the teachings of the carpenter of Nazareth; therefore

RESOLVED, That we protest against the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday; we deny the right of any body of fanatics, numbering only a small part of the country's population, to interfere with the management of so important a national enterprise for the purpose of foisting a proscriptiv and dubious religion upon the majority; we declare it to be our belief that these meddlers are not so much concerned in securing a day of rest for wage-earners as they are in bolstering up by law and custom their tottering institutions; we advise them to discover better methods than any they are now familiar with to honor the name of their gentle and humane master, and we demand that the board of managers shall refrain from any action that will shut out workingmen from the Fair on the day which, under existing conditions, is the only available one for them and their families.

COMPANION SPEECHES.

Chicago Evening Post.

Colonel Shepard's reading of Dr. Francis L. Patton's famous "so-much-the-worse-for-the-workingman" apothegm is sufficiently ingenious, but, with all respect to the colonel, it wholly lacks authority. Dr. Patton is a trained scholar and logician who fully understands the meaning of words. If he had desired in any way to amend, annotate, or explain away the utterance he originally delivered to the Evening Post last Wednesday, he would unquestionably hav done so with his own hand. Five days hav elapsed since Dr. Patton spoke these ever-memorable words, and, though the columns of this paper, and, doubtless, every other paper in Chicago as well, hav been open to him, the good doctor has offered no word, whether of explanation or denial. We shall therefore take the liberty of concluding that Dr. Patton intended and still intends his words to be accepted on their face value, as they stand, viz:

"I know all sorts of reasons hav been urged why the Fair should be kept open on Sunday. It has been said that the workingman and his family cannot see the Fair on any other day. So much the worse for him."

This observation, clear, pointed, unmistakable, goes therefore into history alongside of that famous expression from the lips of one of Colonel Shepard's distinguished relativs (by marriage):

"The public be damned!"

SUNDAY AND THE WORLD'S FAIR.

From the Philadelphia Telegraph.

There is a wide difference between making Sunday what it is in the Old World, especially on the European continent, and making it a day of idle gloom and unrest for the masses of toilers. It is most difficult to perceive that harm can come to them through a Sunday visit to objects which in themselvs are free from offense, which excite pleasurable feelings, and instruct and enlighten the mind. If the Fair of 1893 should be opened on Sundays, the world or this country would scarcely be the worse for it; and there is reason to believe that hundreds of thousands of our people would be the better for it. The religion which is to-day doing the most good is that which appeals to the minds and the hearts of the multitudes as much as to the soul; it is a broader and a more helpful and cheerful religion than that upon which the Puritans and Covenanters built their Sunday laws; it conforms more to the general spirit of humanity and the daily needs of the world than its predecessor did, and it seems to regard with favor everything that enlightens and refines the masses of the people. If the Chicago Fair shall do this on six days of the week it is felt that it may do it on the seventh.

SUNDAY, MONDAY, AND THE FAIR.

From the New York World.

The World's Fair at Chicago will be something more and better than a national glorification. It will be a great educational opportunity for the people.

Bigotry and crankism hav combined in an effort to cripple its educational capacity by securing the closing of its gates on the only day of the week when the great multitude of workingmen and their families hav leisure to visit it.

This effort should be met now with a protest that will defeat it. If the Fair is not to be open on Sunday it will lose half its value and half its interest to enlightened minds.

The employees of the Fair and of exhibitors ought not to work seven days in the week. But substitution will easily avoid that. If not, the Fair can be closed on Monday, as the Louvre and the Luxembourg are, for cleansing and for the recreation of the attendants. Monday is always the day when visitors to a great exhibition are fewest in number. Sunday is the day when they are always most numerous. To close the Fair on Monday would be a rational proceeding; to close it on Sunday would be to defeat its best usefulness.

If a day of rest for employees cannot be provided without closing the Fair for a day in each week, in the name of right and reason let the great American washday be the one selected for that purpose.

LADY MANAGERS AND COLONEL SHEPARD.

From the Chicago Herald.

The distinguished Sabbatarian, Colonel Shepherd, of New York, won a barren victory on Saturday when he secured the adoption by the board of lady managers of the World's Fair of an equivocal resolution in favor of Sunday closing. The vote was 36 to 26. Doubtless a good many of the women voted aye as a matter of courtesy and from an unwillingness to encounter misrepresentation and abuse. They knew also that the question as it was presented to them was wholly sentimental and that in its actual determination they would hav no voice. If a vote in the affirmativ would please the eminent pietists present and cause no injury to anybody else, why withhold it? So arguing, the majority of the women arrayed themselvs on the side of the Sunday closers and the latter will go away with the consciousness that their visit was not wholly in vain.

In the last national convention that Roscoe Conkling adorned, an antagonist had grandiosely described the wild popularity of Mr. Blaine in the Northwest and on the Pacific. "He will carry the territories like a tornado." When Conkling arose to put Grant in nomination he disposed of claims for electoral votes for Blaine in various quarters; and, then, with his ineffable sneer, he drawled out: "As for the territories, they hav no votes." When reference is made hereafter to the action of the women's board on the Sunday Fair question a point of order will end the matter. The gallant colonel carried the ladies for his side with as much enthusiasm as Mr. Blaine would hav carried the territories. But alack, the question is one over which the ladies hav no jurisdiction. It appertains exclusivly to the commission and the directory. The ladies on the Sunday opening are like the territories in relation to the electoral college. They hav no votes. On this shield the lance of the gallant colonel, bright and beautiful though it be, must hurtless break.

Herbert Spencer's Social Ideas.

From the Cleveland Plaindealer.

Fancy a man about five feet nine inches in hight, wearing gray trousers, a black frock coat, a low-cut white waistcoat, highly-polished boots and cream-colored overgaiters, an old-fashioned stand-up collar and black tie, on his head a shiny silk hat and in his hands gloves and an umbrella. His face betokens good nature. His eyes are gray and soft. His mouth is firm. His cheeks are pinky white. Bushy iron-gray whiskers encircle his neck. He is a man you would look at a second time even in crowded London; and well you might, for it is none other than Herbert Spencer, the philosopher and author. I catch this glimpse of him as he precedes me up the steps of the Atheneum Club in Pall Mall. He has made an appointment to meet me there this afternoon for a talk on some of the great problems of the day.

The privilege of a conversation with Mr. Spencer is not to be lightly esteemed. It is apparently also not easily to be gained. Even the ordinary Englishman is not to be called on without a letter of introduction and without ample warning, and Mr. Spencer hedges himself about with extra precautions against intrusion. He has a lithographed letter ready for inquirers, and he sends it to all people who want him to be a committeeman for some public enterprise, charity, or movement; to students who desire some further expounding of his theories than is given in his books, to autograph hunters, and, of course, to interviewers. It is said that Mr. Spencer went all over America without yielding once to the newspaper reporter, and I therefore feel a bit jubilant at having secured his attention. It was done, of course, by letter. Mr. Spencer's reply was the lithographed document referred to, but he kindly added a few lines in his own hand, granting my request and appointing a meeting. As his lithographed letter laid much stress upon his failing strength and the consequent pressure upon his time I was in some trepidation about calling on him, fearing to find myself confronted with an oger, cross-grained, rickety, and impatient. It was, therefore, a pleasant surprise to see this tall, straight old gentleman, with a firm step and a smooth voice, come forward. Although he is seventy-one years of age he does not appear to be over sixty.

"Won't you walk upstairs?" he asked. "There will be better accommodation for conversation there." And upstairs we went, the aged philosopher mounting the steps with the ease and agility of a young man. The conversation was charming. Mr. Spencer talked as freely as if he had no fear whatever of newspaper writers. His voice is not only musical, but his enunciation is remarkably clear and correct. Every syllable is plainly sounded with an incisivness that might seem to be affected if it were not so evidently the result of long devotion to the correct use of language. The conversation took a wide range.

"Your new book is creating much talk," I said.

"Well," said Mr. Spencer modestly, "I am glad if such be the case. I am fortunate in having many friends in Europe and America. My writings were recognized rather earlier in America than they were here, but of late years the returns from my works in England hav been very much greater than from America; partly because my rate of profit per copy here is much larger, and partly because the English editions supply the colonies. Since I began to write there has been a clear reaction against individual liberty. We are certainly tending toward state Socialism, which will be a worse form of tyranny than that of any government now recognized in civilization."

"And after state Socialism, what?"

"Military despotism. At present the state is absorbing the individual activity of men. It is intermeddling in all manner of ways in what should be private enterprise. Gradually the state will usurp the functions of private enterprise to such an extent that the people will one day awake to it; but it will be long before they make an effectiv resistance. I cannot but think that the struggle will be severe—something terrible to contemplate; but I do not pretend to set a date for the catastrophe or to anticipate its horrors. The progress of the doctrin of evolution throughout the world is unquestionable, but at the same time I cannot say that I see any movement in the direction of my own views, politically. Since I began to write there has been, as I said before, a clear reaction against individual liberty."

"Do you not think that we may escape this catastrophe in America?"

"No. The American imagins that he enjoys the advantages of liberty, but the fact is that there, as elsewhere in the civilized world, the state is steadily and rapidly absorbing the individual's freedom of action. The American has the form of self-sovereignty, but he does not hav it in reality. It is difficult to foresee what will be the outcome of American progress; but I do not think that your republic will escape the consequences of the general struggle. The fact is, few men hav any true appreciation of liberty. It was in your own country that a gentleman said to me: 'If the majority told me what I should eat, I would obey.' Now, he thought he was a free man; he thought that he appreciated liberty. But such an attitude is an admission of dependence upon authority. Subservience to a majority in personal concerns is as bad as subservience to a king, and there can be no worse despot than the majority. Just in the same way that men hav now come to resist the dictation of the state (be it one man or a majority of men) in respect to their religious beliefs; so, when they fully understand liberty, will they come to resist such dictation, even of the million as of the one, in matters of private concern."

"On the question of reform. What is your idea of the greatest reform we stand in need of to-day, political, educational, or what?"

"The great reform needed is to insist everywhere and always that each man shall take the consequence of his own nature; shall hav without deduction all the benefits of his own nature and actions, and take all the evils of his own nature and actions, and shall neither saddle these evils on other people nor be defrauded by other people of the benefits. This is the only law which should be insisted on, not only in the conduct of individuals to one another, but also in the conduct of the state to individuals. One of the non-committants of the disregard of that fundamental principle is seen in your admiration for the 'smart' men. A smart man is by the very conception of him, a man who does not regard conscientiously the claims of others—who endeavors to obtain from them some of the legitimate results of their activities which should remain with them, and which in an indirect way he filches from them. In fact in a society in which there was a complete recognition and enforcement of the principle specified, there would be no place for 'smart men.'"

"Are not what are called 'the poor class' better educated and better clothed to-day than they were before?"

"They may be educated in a sense—know more of grammar, history, geography, etc., but they are not educated in the least in all matters that concern society."

"It has been said that this is partly due to the fact that the preacher and the church hav not done their duty."

"Well, the church insists upon all forms expressiv of religious subordination, and disregards the essential principles which the creed enunciates. At the same time that they are having here weeks of prayer and early services and reading their Bibles before breakfast, they are countenancing and participating in filibustering expeditions all over the world and appropriating the lands of other people. That is to say, they are disregarding the essential principles of their religion while they profess anxiety to propagate them."

"What man, the preacher, the author, or editor, is going to help our people most?"

"Teaching does little. The disciplin of life does everything. There is nothing to do but to insist upon the carrying on of life in a thoroughly honest, conscientious way and reprobating everything that does not conform to a high standard of conduct. But I do not see much hope of change in this direction while your material development is going on at so great a rate. In a society like yours ambition inevitably takes the direction of acquiring wealth and the struggle for this brings inevitable evils. So long as you hav the American continent to subdue and people I do not suppose you will change much in your ethical standards."

"Are you still engaged in the production of books?"

"Yes; and I want to say to you that I shall not take advantage of the new American copyright law. I shall continue to do as I hav done heretofore. I shall send over to America the stereotype plates of my book and hav them printed there without seeking for any protection from the American government. This new law is really prejudicial to the interests of literature. The tendency always is for the graver books to be swamped in the flood of light literature; and just in proportion as the arrangements are such as tempt publishers to push the sale of light literature, just in that proportion are the books of the graver kind likely to be more swamped than they are now. With this copyright law it will pay the American publisher less than it did before to take up books of a kind which are of doubtful sale. The fatal defect in the law is that it puts the author or publisher to the expense of a doubtful manufacture in supplying two communities. In these two communities there are eighty million of people. In America about ten thousand of these (to make a liberal estimate) are engaged in setting type for reproduction of English publications, and for the sake of benefiting these ten thousand the law compels eighty million to pay a higher price for their books. In so far as the new law recognizes the proprietary rights of an author, it may be accepted as a good step in the right direction, but there will hav to be a change before the literature which deserves protection can gain any benefit from it. Instead of encouraging the unknown author of serious books, this law makes it harder for him to gain due recognition than it was before. Under this American law the publisher will seek out the man who has made his name; he will buy the popular author's works and distribute them very widely, and meantime the rising man will be left to his own devices. The general effect will be to multiply the reproduction of books which hav no serious influence upon the world, and to discourage those who write books of instruction."

"About American literature?"

"I hav read very little."

"What about America?"

"I believe it has a grand future, but I think that there will come a great deal of tribulation before that future is realized."

"About the position that woman is likely to take in the bringing about of better things?"

"On that point I thoroughly agree that all careers in life shall be left open to women to succeed or not to succeed as they can, but I do not agree to giving them political power."

"But are they not underpaid?"

"Well, the pay must be proportioned to the work they do. It will adjust itself to the goodness of the production. That cannot be prevented."

The conversation then turned upon other and lighter topics. As I left him Mr. Spencer asked for a typewritten copy of the interview that he might revise it before publication. The above is just as it came to me after revision. DAVID WECHSLER.

Of Mr. Spencer's daily life the general public knows little. He livs very comfortably near Regent's park and is happy in the companionship of a few old friends and his books. He is now, as he has ever been, a great reader. He travels about in a leisurely way and often writes some stirring articles for the newspapers or magazines. But in the main his is a quiet life. He dines away from home quite often, and sometimes goes to great banquets and places of amusement. Life is very pleasant to him. He is still on the sunny side of the road and in perfect health. He has been honored by having his works extensivly translated. All are rendered into French, many into German, Russian, Italian, Spanish, Hungarian, Greek, Japanese, and Chinese. Many offers of academic honors hav come to him, but all hav been declined. The old philosopher sits calmly in the twilight of life, watching the struggles of others who must soon take up the work that has been his life's duty.

The Blasphemous Rain-Compellers.

That rain can be produced at will by human agencies is now a demonstrated fact, and henceforth, when rain is needed, we will not hav to depend upon the prayers of the righteous and the whim of an "all-wise" providence. The terrible drouth will be overcome, thousands of dollars' worth of property will be kept from ruin, suffering humanity will be refreshed and relieved, and in many cases lives will be saved. One hundred and fifty years ago the man who would hav suggested the possibility of producing rain would very likely hav been considered a crank and hooted into insignificance. Two or three hundred years ago he would probably hav been burnt at the stake or otherwise disposed of as a heretic or a wizard. About eighteen hundred years ago had anyone caused rain by any other method than the old reliable one of prayer, he would either hav been entitled to associate with Jesus as a co-miracle-worker and enjoy with him everlasting glory, or would hav been put to death and his soul sent to endless perdition on suspicion of being an agent of the devil. But now in the progressiv nineteenth century, when the world is better protected from religious persecution and interference, if an individual conceives of a scheme for doing anything that has hitherto seemed impossible, no matter how cranky he may be considered, he is at liberty to work out his idea, and if it does the world no good, it seldom if ever does it any harm.

And now that the rain cranks hav succeeded in making it rain, the next thing for them to do is to invent some means of preventing rain. This may not be done so readily perhaps, but in consideration of the wonderful achievements of our modern scientists, who will say that it is utterly impossible of accomplishment?

We never know very many days in advance when it is going to rain, but when it does rain, and rains good and hard, we can be reasonably sure of pretty fair weather for the next few days. Therefore, if a hard shower could be produced on Monday, and lasted over Tuesday, then probably the rest of the week would be clear. If this could be done, and the government should establish a rain-tower on every fifty or one hundred square miles of utilized land, and should cause it to rain at stated intervals, then the people could make their arrangements accordingly, and not be always running the risk of getting a wetting.

I hav often thought that God would hav been a good deal wiser if he had set apart one day in the week for rain instead of worship and rest, and let the people worship and rest to suit themselvs. It would hav saved scores of bonnets and bangs and tears for the ladies, and a good many boots and trousers and oaths for the men, and a vast amount of sickness and death for both.

Bellamy's plan of stretching awnings over the streets on rainy days is a good one for the people in town, but would hardly overcome the destruction and disappointment to the farmers and picnickers. What a glorious improvement it would be if the weather were under the perfect control of the people.

For instance, Monday and Tuesday would be rainy days, and all in-door pleasures and business would be set apart for those days, and folks who were obliged to go out would go with umbrellas and overshoes, and not be like the Methodists who went to camp-meeting to pray for rain and provided themselvs with no shelter in case their prayers should be answered. Then the priests and ministers would be forced to acknowledge the absurdity of their own faith and the unreliability of their God, and would undoubtedly be benefited by the works of the ungodly rain-makers. We hope that whenever a Freethinker sees an article in his local paper in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays he will mark it and send a copy to Benjamin Butterworth, secretary Board of Directors of World's Fair, Rand-McNally building, Chicago, Ill., and to John T. Dickinson, secretary National Commission of World's Fair, at the same address. Let us make a vigorous and persistent fight in this matter. Our efforts must not slacken till the final decision is made, which may not be till 1893.

We shall print next week the full text of the decision of the Attorney-General of the state of Washington forbidding the reading of the Bible in the public schools of that state. It is a great victory for the Freethinkers who hav so persistently labored in the cause of justice on the Pacific coast.

The Bible Picture Book, we take pleasure in saying, is now under way, and will be issued as soon this fall as the work can be done and done well. The price will be $1, and it will contain a great deal for that amount. In renewing for THE TRUTH SEEKER we hope our readers will not forget to inclose the dollar for it.

To Some of Our New Friends.

When we took the Freethought subscribers into THE TRUTH SEEKER family, there were a few hundred of them who had paid nothing to Freethought for a year or two.

We want to warn these that such is not the way to advance the cause, as they can easily see by the fate of their favorit paper, than which none was more ably conducted.

They hav now had THE TRUTH SEEKER several weeks, during which time we hav heard nothing from them, not even whether they like the paper or dislike it. And we reluctantly say that unless we hear from them substantially at once their names will hav to be taken from the list. If they want the paper the least they can do is to say so, and make a part payment of their indebtedness.

We hav received the following from one of Freethought's patrons:

"I am receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER all O. K., as changed from Freethought. I take extra copies for circulating among the people to do missionary work. I find THE TRUTH SEEKER better than a few years ago. Glad to see it holding its own and even improving. You will hear of me occasionally.

"Yours truly, CHARLES F. BLACKBURN."

We trust that others will follow Mr. Blackburn's example and let us hear from them.

The Criminality of Ministers and Their Victims.

Mr. Z. A. Gleason, a truth seeking friend living in Kiowa, Kan., makes the following inquiry: "Some months ago, in a controversy with my brother, a Baptist minister (and by the by a very well-meaning man), I made the statement that the ministry furnished more criminals than either of the other professions. He wishes to know my authority. In one or two states I think they hav taken pains to ascertain the early education and the religious bent of the mind of its prisoners. Can you, Mr. Editor, through the columns of your valuable paper, giv me any information or authority in reference to these matters?"

There are no figures extant that we know about which giv the exact percentage of preachers in prison, or convicted of immorality, compared with doctors, lawyers, artists, actors, and members of other professions. The one sin of which preachers hav almost a monopoly—offenses with and against women—is not usually punished by the secular arm, and so a list of preachers in prison would afford no indication of how many had offended the moral if not the secular law. The only statistics dealing with this subject are embraced in "The Crimes of Preachers," and the author's opportunities for collecting figures were limited. But in reading about a dozen newspapers, covering a territory containing some thirty-five thousand ministers—less than one-half in the United States—he found some facts calculated to startle the thinking person. In seven years he found 2,053 crimes charged against the preachers, of which 1,113 were against women. Some of the preachers had two or three crimes charged against them. This wholesale showing led the author to a little reflection, to wit: "The crimes charged hav been mostly from the Northern states, and from about 35,000 priests and preachers. Now, 35,000 men, after reaching maturity, with average health, liv about twenty-seven years, on the average. Make some allowance for 'parsonitis' with this class, and giv an average age to preachers of twenty-five years, after they begin to preach, including 'boy preachers.' Then this compilation, commenced in 1876, and the 35,000 preachers then 'heralding glad tidings to a dying world,' would liv twenty-five years, or till 1901—say 1900; the recruits supplying the places of those 'killed and wounded,' i.e., died and 'otherwise accounted for.'

"Now let us make a different computation to ascertain the amount of crime committed by the tribe of 'sky-pilots.' If 35,000 preachers hav committed 2,000 crimes in seven years, 35,000 clergymen will commit 7,140 in twenty-five years. If but one out of sixteen has had his offense discovered and published, then 35,000 'guides to holiness' commit one hundred and fourteen thousand crimes in twenty-five years; and this presuming that the author has collated every instance of published offenses. If half of the 'gentlemen of the cloth' are innocent, the other half will be guilty of 228,000 crimes in twenty-five years. But, says one, you are computing upon the basis of the number of crimes charged, not upon the number of criminals. Well, let us compute upon the number of priests and preachers charged with crime; let us see how that would figure. We hav 870 names now published in this work during seven years, the data for the first three or four years being very incomplete; that will be 3,100 in twenty-five years, on the same ratio. But take the ratio of the last two years, of nearly 200 per year, and the number in twenty-five years will be five thousand—ascertained and published criminals, 'wearing the livery of heaven!' Only one out of sixteen having been detected and his crime published, this 5,000 must be multiplied by 16, making 80,000 reverend criminals in twenty-five years—that is, in the lifetime of thirty-five thousand preachers there will be eighty thousand criminal preachers! And so notoriously criminal that their names and crimes will be so thoroughly published that an ordinary newspaper reader in a little city in Iowa will see it and preserve the account. Really, the bureau of public justice (?) should furnish the author with a good corps of clerks to keep this good work going on, so that the people may see just what kind of gentry these are, who assume to write all of our school-books, control our system of education, teach our children at Sunday-schools, deliver the 'word of God' from the pulpit, and visit our wives and daughters to see about their 'spiritual welfare!'

"And now, reader, we ask, in all candor, is there anything unfair in the above computation? If so, show us where it is. Facts are stubborn things; figures won't lie. The preacher has many ways to conceal his fault that the poor laborer has not, besides having the greater cunning of education and the aid of powerful and superstitious friends, none of which is at the service of the poor criminal. And then, of the 2,053 crimes charged against these 'followers of Jesus,' 1,113 hav been committed against women—more than one-half of the crimes! Do ladies as a rule proclaim to newspaper reporters their own shame for the sake of having the parson's crime published? How much of such crime ever really gets before the public eye?

"The statistics of crime, including the preachers, show that but about three per cent of all crime committed is against women. Do the ladies always 'tell on' the dominie? The philosopher who has the good of posterity at heart may even express a doubt of its having the best of parentage.

"There is no denying these facts. The data are open to all. Then this exposé should cause even the most bigoted and superstitious to think, and, upon thought, to act."

The religious prejudices of criminals who hav not taken holy orders are more easily obtained. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 18, 1885, we collated and published the figures showing the religious belief of criminals confined in sixty-six American prisons. These included the prisons of Iowa, Michigan, Tennessee, New York, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Indiana, Illinois, and Canada. In these sixty-six different prisons, jails, reformatories, refuges, penitentiaries, and "lock-ups," there were for the years given 44,034 men and boys, women and girls. The different religions and sects of religion were represented as follows:

Catholics	16,431	Congregationalist	11
Church of England	9,975	German Lutheran	7
Protestants (denomination unknown)	6,650	" Evangelical	1
Methodist	3,931	" Jews	2
Presbyterian	3,703	United Brethren	3
Baptist	240	Advent	2
Jews	106	Dutch Reform	8
Lutheran	92	Mormon	3
Christian	24	Episcopal	126
Universalist	5	Carmelite	3
Evangelical	4	Joss (China)	1
Swedish church	2	Infidel (2 so-called; 1 avowed)	3
Dunkard	1
Quaker	1	Total	41,335

The remaining 2,699 were described by the original compilers of the statistics as regular or irregular attendants at Sunday-school and church. None of them professed Infidelity to Christianity. They probably belong to that large class who think but little on the subjects of heaven and hell, realizing, as Mark Twain has said, that they "hav friends in both places." The statistics show that the ranks of crime are recruited from the "soldiers of the cross." The one to three exceptions merely prove the rule.

By a paragraph in the Christian Life of the current year we see that Canada at least is maintaining her average. In the common jails of Ontario, Canada, 11,810 persons were locked up last year. No less than 2,448 were unable to read or write. The religious denominations were represented as follows:

Roman Catholic	4,359
Church of England	3,631
Methodists	1,624
Presbyterians	1,498
Other denominations	698
Total	11,810

A few months ago we obtained the statistics of the Leavenworth, Kan., penitentiary. The report showed:

Prisoners whose parents were church-members	500
" " " " non-church-members	175
" who did not know anything about it	69

The denominations of these parental sponsors were:

Catholic	69	Lutheran	20
Methodist	175	Episcopal	7
Baptist	125	Congregational	8
Presbyterian	30	Dunkard	1
United Presbyterian	2	Advent	4
Cumberland Pres'terian	10	Quaker	1
Christian	30	Unknown	10
United Brethren	8

More than one-half of the prisoners belonged to some church, the Methodists leading; more than two to one—500 to 244—attended Sunday-school regularly in their younger days, and nearly one-half were too pious to swear. The figures of the Pennsylvania penitentiary for the same year corroborate those from Kansas. During 1890 there were two hundred and ninety prisoners received. They were pious as follows:

Catholics	97	United Brethren	6
Methodists	91	Episcopalians	5
Lutherans	25	Scattering	18
Presbyterians	25	No denomination	10
Baptists	13

Here we hav fourteen-fifteenths of the population of a penitentiary belonging to one or another Christian denomination. A Western paper, moralizing upon the subject, says: "If this same ratio holds good in other states, our students of morality had best giv the statistics close attention and readjust certain prevalent beliefs. Pennsylvania is doubtless no worse and no better than other states, but the idea of a state penitentiary filled with sober, educated, industrious, well-trained church-members certainly offers food for thought."

However incomplete these figures may be, they are sufficiently general to show conclusivly—were it not already a well-established fact—that preaching Christianity and believing it in no way conduces to a moral and honest life.

To Test the "Supernormal."

Following Mrs. Besant's visit to this country in behalf of Theosophy comes Mr. H. S. Olcott, Madam Blavatsky's partner in occult mystification. Thursday evening of last week he lectured in this city, and added his personal testimony to the statement of Mrs. Besant that she had received letters delivered by Mahatmas. Madam Blavatsky, he said, had great psychic powers. She could manipulate the forces of nature to produce phenomena which were startling. She could develop the power of talking mentally with persons at a great distance. "Blavatsky's good faith was called in question," he said, "her character traduced, criminal things were said about her. We are indignant because such things should be poured out upon a person who lived only to do good for others. She was accused of the forgery of the letters from the sages of India to Mrs. Besant. But since her death Mrs. Besant has received other letters in the same handwriting. I hav received them myself on land and at sea."

This delivery and reception of letters through "supernormal" agencies seems to bear to Theosophy the same crucial relation that independent slate-writing bears to Spiritualism. It is asserted that messages are written and delivered without human aid, and great tales are told of what has happened in that line; but for some reason no tangible evidence that the assertions are true is produced. Just as we offered the slate-writing mediums the opportunity to prove the genuinness of their phenomena the Sun has now opened to Colonel Olcott a way to convince the skeptical that he is not a person who states things that are not so. Its offer is this: that it has put under seal and in a secure place a brief communication addressed to a certain person living not less than five hundred miles from Printing House square, and not more than five thousand miles, and cordially invites Mr. Olcott to demonstrate once and forever not only the truth of his Theosophical teachings, but also his complete mental sanity and personal veracity, in either one of two ways: 1. By forwarding this letter to the person for whom it is intended, through the mysterious channels of the Mahatma quick postal delivery. 2. By ascertaining through Mahatma intelligence and communicating to the public through the columns of the Sun or some other newspaper the contents of the missiv in question.

Mr. Olcott has affirmed to various persons, including the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that letters hav been transmitted through Mahatma agency to himself, and also, since then, to Madame Blavatsky and to Mrs. Annie Besant. He has seen the Mahatma carriers actually upon their rounds. On one occasion, he tells us, he was awakened from sleep at Lahore by the entrance of the astral body of a Mahatma, whose body of flesh and blood was at that moment in Madras, a thousand miles away. The astral carrier put his finger upon the hierophant's palm, and then there was materialized a letter incased in a silken envelope. The letter was from Madras, whence Blavatsky had availed herself of this method of communicating with her distant friend and disciple. Having performed the errand on which he had been sent, the Mahatma letter carrier dematerialized and disappeared. "I didn't see him go," testifies Mr. Olcott, "he simply wasn't any more. The letter from Blavatsky was there, and it was a very important one."

Now, says the Sun, "as an old journalist, lawyer, and a man of the world, the Apostle of Theosophy will perceive at once the enormous practical value of our suggestion to himself and his cause. Nor should we suppose that the Mahatmas would be any slower to appreciate the opportunity. A certificate from the Sun that either of the two feats suggested above has been successfully performed by the intervention of adepts from headquarters, will be worth more for the propagation of the Theosophic faith and the regeneration of society according to the hierophant's ideas, than all of the books Blavatsky ever wrote and all of the lectures Colonel Olcott can deliver if he livs to the age of the minor patriarchs. Once before this we hav opened for the hierophant the door to public confidence. When he declined the Sun's invitation to establish his sincerity by levitating himself gently from the top of the Tribune's tall tower to the pavement of Printing House square, he was hardly more than a beginner and naturally was concerned for his bones. Instead of jumping from the Tribune tower, he sailed for Bombay. Since that the hierophant has spent seventeen years at the very fountainhead of occult science, in constant association with the most illuminated members of adept society. If after seventeen years of unquestioning faith and unselfish devotion he cannot count upon the kindnesses of a single Mahatma in the whole postal service to carry one little letter at his request, and that for the sake of proving him no fool and no liar, then we are decidedly of the opinion the hierophant had better quit company and go into some other business."

Until the Theosophists and the slate-writing mediums accept such reasonable propositions as hav been made to them by two editors in this city they should suspend their assertiv claims which tax public credulity so heavily.

Mr. Crafts's Consolation and Plan.

Mr. Wilbur F. Crafts, a Sabbatarian worker of great industry, has been counting the petitions for closing the World's Fair on Sundays, and finds instead of the one hundred thousand expected only thirteen hundred and fifty-six. Thereupon he berates the preachers and churches for their lack of zeal, and asks them to begin hustling and to keep hustling.

He pretends however to find consolation in the fact "that the opposition petitions are yet more of a fizzle. The petitions for Sunday opening were hardly enough to count. The petition printed in the leading Infidel paper and sent out in its regular issue, with a frantic appeal to subscribers to sign and circulate, gathered in all its copies about seventy names. The North American Turnerbund had also circulated among German societies a printed petition, but only half a dozen of these bodies had adopted and sent it in, including the turners' convention of Iowa and western Illinois, and Germans of Toledo and the trades assembly of Duluth, the latter being the only workingmen's organization represented in the petitioning."

It may be bad to destroy Mr. Crafts's contentment at this condition, but we shall hav to do so. The petition sent out by the leading Infidel paper has never been turned over to the managers of the Fair. We hav kept it in hand to be used as a text for a Freethinker to address the directorate upon. And instead of seventy names only having been gathered, the leading Infidel paper gathered thousands, almost whole townships in some cases signing. So Mr. Crafts can see that his consolation has no very substantial basis after all. And we suspect that before this question is finally settled Mr. Crafts will find his other sources of consolation as shadowy as this one.

But there is one paragraph in Mr. Crafts's complaint that we can print and recommend to our readers as a good plan—only they must use it for a precisely opposit purpose than does Mr. Crafts. He says: "Petitions adopted at a single vote may be made effectiv in a dozen directions by making a dozen duplicates. There was a bill before the last Congress that all exhibitions to which national funds were appropriated should keep the national Sabbath. Therefore a petition should be sent from each place to one of its national Senators for the Senate and another copy, duly signed, to the Congressman for the other house, as the bill will doubtless be reintroduced. The Columbian directory, the local Chicago management, which will be first to act, and the Columbian commission, who has the power of veto in behalf of the whole nation, should each hav a separate petition. And copies (letters also in abundance) should be sent for personal influence to the two state commissioners, their two alternates, and to the two lady managers and their alternates, since these persons, not any impersonal commission, will decide the question and should be made to feel the sentiments of the nation in this matter, not only by petitions and letters in every mail but also by personal interviews. This corresponds to the method of petitioning Congress by sending petitions and lobbyists to Senators and Congressmen, not to Congress in the abstract. Petitions sent to the 'commission' are not seen by the commissioners, save now and then by one zealous enough to hunt them out of their pigeon-holes."

We hope that every Freethinker in the country will do just as Mr. Crafts requests, only making their efforts against Sunday closing instead of in favor of that iniquitous policy.

A Sensible School Committee.

One of the teachers in the Reading, Pa., public schools used the Douay version of the Bible for the morning lesson in her school, and the Protestants were powerless to prevent it, as all versions of the Bible stand equal before the law, according to the decision in the Sharpsburg case, where the court denied application for an injunction to prevent the reading of the King James version in a common school.

This use of a Catholic work led to a long controversy between the two sects, and to the final submission of the question to the school supply committee for solution. The committee recommended that all versions of the Bible be taken from the schools and copies of Shakspere purchased as substitutes.

It is too bad that such a sensible plan was not carried out, but the school board hastened to prevent its execution by agreeing that the Bible should still be retained in the schools and that only such copies as are furnished by the board shall be used. By this latter provision the opponents of the Douay version hav carried their point, and the revised Bible of 1881 will hereafter be supplied to the Reading schools. This, of course, is an act of injustice to Infidels, Catholics, and Jews; but then, Protestants hav never been noted, more than Catholics, for being just to religious opponents.

THE New York Tribune observes: "The Holy Coat of Trier is alleged to be the garment without seam which Christ wore during his passion and for which the Roman soldiers cast lots at the crucifixion. Its history for the last eight hundred years is clear enough. In all that time it has been preserved in the cathedral, generally sealed up in an altar. But darkness shrouds the story of the relic prior to the twelfth century." Darkness likewise shrouds the story of the Old Testament writings prior to the fifth century before Christ. Darkness shrouds, too, the story of the New Testament manuscripts prior to the third century after Christ. Darkness shrouds the origin of every one of the supernatural antiquities of the church. In fact, it shrouds at present the brains of all the believers of that institution. The church informs us that the Lord, even, moveth in "thick darkness," and that Freethinkers will some day find themselvs in "outer darkness" amid an annoying gnashing. We suppose that Christianity must be a religion of darkness. Nevertheless, its gloom is here and there dotted with the glow of flames around a stake.

THE annual breeding of that scourge of nations, cholera, by a superstitious practice, is thus pointed out by the Allahabad Pioneer: About six miles east of Mecca is a place called Moona, where the sacrifices of the Mohammedan religion hav to be offered up at the yearly Hadj. In no other place about Mecca is it lawful under the religious code to slay animals. The number of beasts killed, from camels to goats, is about seventy thousand. Nearly all these are slain in one day. The odors are described as awful beyond words, no attempt being made to dispose of the refuse. Here the annual epidemic of cholera begins and is carried by the Hadji to their various countries. For many years to come the season of the Hadj will be in the warm weather, and while Mohammedanism lasts there seems to be no interfering with this origin of cholera. This is the old story of superstition commanding observances antagonistic to the natural well-being of man and fanatically repulsing all endeavors at correction. How many present infirmities and maladies of the race are to be imputed to scripturally commanded unhealthful practices of the Middle Ages, cannot readily be reckoned. Fasts, omission of bathing, pestilential accumulations of offal, monastic dungeon-life—general neglect of the body—along with suppression of medical practitioners and exaltation of cure by faith, miracle, and relic—who shall compute their effects?

Letters from Friends.

A Necessity to One Keeping Up the Pace.

TECUMSEH, NEB., Sept. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The able editorials and broad-gaged communications of THE TRUTH SEEKER make it almost a necessity to those who would keep pace with the world's most Liberal and advanced thought. C. W. TRICE.

Likes to See the Other Side Admitted.

SPRINGFIELD, MO., Sept. 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4 for renewal and THE TRUTH SEEKER picture-book No. 2. My health has been so bad that I am not able to look up subscribers, or do but little in the reform work. I am not dead yet, but will stay with THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I like its liberality in opening its columns to the other side.

Yours for free discussion, W. S. WILLIS.

Promises to Bear a Torch.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Sept. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You can believe me to be one of your friends, and your paper and pictures suit me to a t. I think Freethought is advancing fast, and I will do all I can to get more subscribers, although it is hard, for we are living here among churches; but it is food for me to read your paper. Hoping Mr. Heston will liv a good many years yet, I remain,

Your friend, DUTCH ARNOLD.

An Intellectual Treat, No Doubt.

SPOKANE, WASH., Sept. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The earnest efforts of a few unorganized Liberals taking advantage of Mr. S. P. Putnam's stop-over here enabled us to hear him lecture on the "Demands of Liberalism" at the Unitarian church last evening. Though a comparativ stranger in Spokane, he was well received, heartily appreciated, and pronounced an able and gentlemanly champion of liberty and justice. We regret that our lack of organization prevents numerous repetitions of similar intellectual treats. Yours verily, J. H. C. SOURLOCK.

A Grave View.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Sept. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I shall be quite lonesome without THE TRUTH SEEKER, so you had better send it to me. I sometimes despair of the world ever being emancipated from the power of the priests. We see in history the Greeks and Romans far advanced in civilization, and yet by the Christian conspiracy of Constantine and the priests how the thousand years or more of the Dark Ages was ushered in; and they are fast gaining power again, especially in this country. The dear people are as easily hoodwinked by the priesthood as ever. Yours truly, J. W. DOWNES.

Mr. Hays's Article Tickled This Friend.

AKRON, O., Sept. 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Every issue of your paper exceeds its predecessor in interest. I was deeply interested in reading the letter of Mr. Joseph Heighton, whose son Marius I am well acquainted with. But the article of Mr. Chas. O. Hays, from this state, in the current issue, takes the cake. This number I intend to preserve, although I am in the habit of distributing my copies when read to any parties who express a desire to read them, whether Christian or Infidel. I regret our inability to maintain an organization in this city, or even to hav occasional lectures, there being but one interested Liberal besides myself in this vicinity.

Fraternally yours, JOHN JAQUES.

In Darkest Christendom.

OTTAWA, O., Sept. 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am ashamed to say that I am the only outspoken Liberal in our town, and possibly in the county. There are quite a number of the same sort, but they believe it is policy to keep in the background. Perhaps it is so, as seven-tenths of the population, at a rough estimate, are German Catholics. However, I not only keep THE TRUTH SEEKERS on my desk in public view, but distribute them where my judgment dictates or they will do the most good. I believe all the churches are becoming more Liberal every day, and it is this Liberalism which holds and controls a large majority who would otherwise come out and affirm their independence as Freethinkers. Hoping that THE TRUTH SEEKER may liv long, I am, C. E. BEARDSLEY.

What Is Meant?

LA LOGIA SINALOA, MEX., Aug. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: A short time ago I read a small pamphlet called "The Wauseka Wonder." I hav just finished reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the Georgia Wonder. Now here is a La Logia Wonder: Everybody knows or has heard of the rapid growth and maturity of plants and such like in this hot climate when it rains. The rainy season began the 1st of July. Work stopped on the ditch. The posts in our corral took root and grew into trees. But what surprised me most was to see a small iron rod that had been left sticking in the ground take root and grow into a crowbar. Now, Eugene, here is a problem we want solved. While people know so much in regard to the world to come we should like to hav some of these wonders explained. Let J. L. Tompkins try again. A. BUTTERFIELD.

Money.

SHERMAN, MICH., Sept. 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We hav seen much in your paper of late about money, and now it is all explained in a catechism. Allow me to notice the first and last. "What is money? Coined metal." Well, if that was so, we would all go to coining money and be rich. We all know that no coined metal is worth anything as money without the government stamp on it, and as money it has no intrinsic value. Its value is just what the government sees fit to make it, and the ability of that government to sustain it. To the last question the answer is easy. Every government has the power to make money, whether given it by its constitution, the people, or assumed. Coin means to make; for instance, there are thousands of new words coined every year that are not on metal or paper. Respectfully, E B. SOUTHWICK.

Let Us Exhibit at the Fair.

GUEMES, WASH., Sept. 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years and a member of the Washington Secular Union for nine months, and I hav been helping the cause of Liberalism all that my limited means will admit. I read in your valuable paper of September 5th, "Let us exhibit at the Fair." I think that a grand idea. It would be the best advertisment of Freethought imaginable. People would go into a building in Chicago to see our exhibit that at home they would not dare to enter for fear of the dear sky-pilots and their worshipers. Now, as to doing anything at Chicago in 1893, when you get ready you can call on me for $25 to help exhibit at Chicago. M. H. WILIFONG

It's Mostly a Wish to Be On the Popular Side.

AUBURN JUNCTION, IND, Sept. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I expected to get some other subscriber with me, but it seems as if most Liberals are indifferent or negligent in such matters. They do not agree with the church people, but will not take any activ part with us or help support a paper in the cause by taking the same. If every one could read Peck's contribution in the last two issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and use their own brains in looking and reasoning it over, they would not be as strong in the Christian faith as they pretend to be. I say pretend, for I do not believe one out of fifty knows what they do believe. They only try to believe or follow some sayings of preachers and others in order to be on the popular side. But I believe the time is coming—though slowly—when men and women will use the brains they hav and investigate such matters more fully. Yours respectfully, W. H. RAKESTRAW.

A Christian Misrepresentation, No Doubt.

DES MOINES, IA., Sept. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The following appears as a dispatch in the Chicago Herald of date Sept. 3, 1891:

KILLED THEMSELVS IN SUCCESSION.

BRADFORD, PA., Sept. 2.—A suicide mania has taken possession of the aged members of a local Agnostic circle here, which was founded by the late Dr. Stuart, who himself led the way by taking his life. Since then three other members of the circle hav tried to kill themselvs and two hav succeeded. The last case occurred yesterday, when Elias Hasley, aged sixty-six, took rat poison and died from its effects.

A few personal friends and myself much desire to ascertain the truth or falsity of the astounding statements contained in the above dispatch, and to this end seek your assistance in bringing the matter to the attention of some responsible person in Bradford, Pa., for confirmation or denial. (Who was Dr. Stuart?) HERMAN TIEDJENS.

Burnt the Paper.

ELMWOOD PLACE, O., Sept. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me some of the back copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I want to distribute them around in our village with the object of organizing a Freethought club. I saw in a copy a short time ago that you would send them on application, so if you send them you will be doing our cause some good. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, and it meets my views "to a t." I shall hav to tell you how a copy came to an untimely end. I gave it to a friend to read and to let me know what he thought of it. He read one or two articles and said he became disgusted and took it out in the yard and set it afire, so as, he says, to keep it from yielding any further contaminating influence. So it goes. The old saying, There is none so blind as those who won't see, fits a great many in our village. There are two of us who like the contaminating influence of the truth and that is why I want to let some light into the brains of those who, like my friend, say the publication of such a paper ought to be stopped. But then there are others that think differently. A. E. WARD.

No Lukewarm Foe of Church and State.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hope to be a life subscriber to your most valuable paper. It is due the giant Heston that we all state our appreciation of his sledge-hammer arguments. It was the pictures that caused me to decide in favor of THE TRUTH SEEKER rather than Secular Thought or the Boston Investigator, which are both worthy and deserving of our support.

I sincerely hope that the World's Columbian Exposition may not be closed on the American Sabbath, although the Sabbath fanatics are doing their level best to close it. This will be a step backward, if taken, that it may take years to regain in Chicago. But I trust the backbone of superstition is so effectually broken that the tyranny of Sabbath laws may never again be entertained by legislation. I think the Liberals and Secularists of all isms in Chicago should heartily unite their efforts and make a stern fight against the aggressiv force of the church and state party.

I hav been dilatory with my support of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but it has been from a financial cause and by no means a careless or thoughtless one. I hope that all who hav been in the same boat may do as I hav done—take the first possible money available (of your own of course) and forward to Mr. Charles P. Somerby, 28 Lafayette place, N. Y, and earnestly help to spread the cause of truth to all who will accept it.

Yours for eternal separation of church and state,

M. J. RALSTON.

A Happy Lecture.

ANGOLA, IND., Sept. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We had a lecture here a short time ago, delivered by Brother Remsburg of Kansas; and although the time of notice was short, yet the friends of liberty and Freethought, like the warriors of old, carried the red cross "over hill-top and plain," spreading the news far and wide, and when the night came for the lecture the Opera House was filled to overflowing with an attentiv and as intelligent an audience as ever greeted a public speaker. And among the audience there was quite a number of those who still cling to the idea of the immaculate conception and the atonement. The subject discussed was the "False Claims" of the orthodox church, and it was handled in a masterly, but in such a gentlemanly manner that no one could take offense; in fact, it was a genuin love-feast, and gave such an impetus to the slumbering sentiments of the friends of the cause here that at the close of the address steps were taken for a permanent organization of a Liberal League. We hav identified with the cause here some of the scundest and brightest intellects in the community—men who hav given the subject deep and careful study, and whose position in society givs weight and dignity to the cause. Let the good work go on. Yours for light, liberty, and Freethought,

J. T.

Pecci for President.

ONEIDA, KAN., Sept. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: "Coming events cast their shadows before," it is said. I notice Mr. Leo has sent his statue to Washington to be set up conspicuously before the gaze of our statesmen, so that when he or his successor comes to locate in our national capital people will acknowledge it as rather a matter of course. I suppose by giving the people popedom in broken or homeopathic doses so as not to astonish them or shock their nerves Ben could just slide down and out of the executiv chair and let Mr. Vincent Joachim Pecci sit down in the same, which would obviate the necessity of such an expenditure or outlay in kerosene oil, monkey clothes, horns, fiddles, bass drums, and noise every four years—the implements we elect presidents with—as all it would require would be a nuncio to negotiate with our department of state. What a saving of campaign funds it would be to the people of this nation, saying nothing about the political lying. Why not? Is it not a capital scheme? I am of the opinion that the above would be only justice to Mr. Leo, inasmuch as he claims that his political combination or corporation, alias church, discovered this country first, saved it from the jaws of the English lion, and then has always protected (!) it against any foreign or internal foe. Then why not turn over the whole shootin'-match to the old man Leo and cease monkeying with the band-wagon unless you can blow a horn? AMERICA.

P.S.—Best wishes to Mr. Watson Heston. May his shadow never diminish.

Temperance.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You will soon observe enough of the writer to know he is strictly for temperance. He has made several attempts to reform habitual drunkards—men who were intelligent and with minds well stored with book and other learning and wisely logical—but, alas! he has never been successful.

At one time in Boston, in the year 1843, a discovery was made by a body of medical philanthropists of a colorless solution to be taken in a glass of water so effectiv and harmless to the partaker that a permanent disgust was henceforth engendered against all kinds of alcoholic fluids. This was, indeed, or ought to hav been, cheering intelligence to all well-wishers of society; but, alas! it was discouraged as dangerous by cautious citizens. But what was more strange, it met a sad rebuff from the Roman Catholics and the religious portion of society, inasmuch as it interfered with the ceremonial of the Lord's Supper. I witnessed three cases of reformation produced in this way. This was many years ago, and the reformed lived many years subsequent as useful citizens. But what to me is more painful to reflect upon is that these philanthropists hav also gone, and borne with them the secret of their simple succedaneum.

I am aware I am esteemed too radical, but to me it seems frightful to behold the multiplicity of liquor saloons surrounding us. Almost every thing or movement really seems to be under the influence of alcohol. But I ask, is it not in the power of law to suppress drunkenness? Make drunkenness a crime, yes, a state prison offense, and it will soon cease to be smiled at, as now, as an amiable weakness.

But (to vary into another tone) I am unblushingly told, Abolish the drinking of liquor and it would be the death-knell of two-thirds of the glorious enterprises of the past and also of the present condition of the world. It was known by my friends that I had a great reverence for the holy Bible, and they directed my attention to the exploits of our great ancestor Noah, who having touched land instantly plunged into indecent drunken debauchery. Only Capitalists Utter That View.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Aug. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I, who am an ardent admirer of your excellent paper, am truly glad to see that you hav opened your columns for the discussion, pro and con, of the national money question. I indorse the views of Mr. John Bryan and Brother Landy as expressed in their letters published in the issue of August 15th last. When Congress passed laws to destroy millions of the people's money and issued bonds for the rich man, that act alone brought many men who were struggling hard and honestly for the advancement of themselvs to the very verge of bankruptcy and ruin. The press of that day blindfolded the people; they were subsidized. And of course the people did not know the consequence until it was too late. Then they awakened to the fearful fact, to find themselvs duped and their money forever gone. There has never in history been a nation more shamefully robbed than the American people by a few money sharks, except Rome, which was the cause of her downfall.

Let the government issue money at a low interest, and farmers, mechanics, and every honest laboring man will be satisfied.

I hav heard it said that when the government issues too much money, or in other words when money is plentiful, it becomes worthless or at least not worth much. This is all humbug and nonsense. That is only said or told by the capitalists and the bankers, or uttered by a subsidized press. The more money we hav in circulation the better for everybody. Who ever heard of anyone having too much money? The Goulds, Vanderbilts, and others of that ilk are every day adding to their millions, and if we hav more than we need for our present use, I am certain it will keep, and we can use it for some good at some future time.

The only question now to be settled is, let the government pass wholesome laws prohibiting the speculation in the value of money. That is to say, let a greenback dollar be worth a hundred cents in gold or silver. Let there be no difference between the one or the other—a gold dollar, a silver dollar, or a paper dollar. When the government puts her stamp on it, it should be recognized as of its true value, and in my opinion as long as the government is at the back of it every nation under the sun will honor it at its true value.

You can put my name down for the next picture-book.

Yours for humanity, etc., LOUIS WOLFES.

Electricity vs. Spirits.

BARRE, MASS., Sept. 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent Geo. L. Andres, September 19th, describes "small, bright lights resembling . . . little stars" seen in the second meeting of a circle held by himself and other skeptics for the purpose of investigating so-called spirit phenomena; and adds, "If any of your readers can enlighten us as to how it can be explained by science, they will confer a favor," etc. I may not be able to explain this in scientific language, but will briefly giv my experience and opinion of forty years' standing. Before I was six years of age, in a dark room bright flickering lights emanated from my flannel garments when removing them on retiring for the night to such an extent that the first time I saw it, child as I was, I ran to my mother in the adjoining room screaming that my clothes were on fire! Of course, it was not seen in the light, and mother quieted me by asking if I did not remember the crackling sparks flying off the cat when I rubbed my hand over her back. From my earliest childhood I can recollect these same sounds on and around my head, and when my hair was unconfined it would fly in all directions. Of course, no sparks were seen in a lighted room or during the day when the crackling was distinctly heard. This phenomenon has accompanied me all my life, and in 1851 became so excessiv as to cause detonations from the slightest ticking to sounds as loud as a percussion cap or the striking of a chairman's gavel when calling an assembly to order. These hav accompanied me ever since, not in circles, but in all places and under all circumstances, varying always as "conditions" varied. Frequently they came in clusters so loud they could be distinctly heard by everyone in the room. The cause of this phenomenon I attribute to the same source as atmospheric electricity, calling it in 1845—for want of a better name—human electricity, or etherealized, vitalized electricity; and hav never since changed my opinion. I believe mankind are organized on electrical principles, and that in my case a superabundance of the fluid caused all the phenomena, the electricity being generated within myself and set at liberty by the various elements with which I came in contact—human beings the most prolific source, the positiv and negativ forces of mind, as well as matter, controling these sounds and emanations from like causes and under similar laws as atmospherical, animal, or vegetable electricity or magnetism. In a circle, each person possesses his or her own individual mental and physical electricity; repulsions and attractions are taking place according to the laws of human electricity, and as nothing in nature is more powerful and freakish than a thunderbolt that rends without firing or fires without rending so this human electricity is so powerful as to split a table in twain when the hands of positiv and negativ persons are laid upon it in a mixed circle. I will say nothing more, lest I take up too much space, being also well aware that my opinion will be denied and derided by a large class of people who attribute the whole of these phenomena to spiritual agency; but I hope I shall be excused, as the question was asked and I hav replied in good faith according to the best of my ability. ELLA E. GIBSON.

The Bar Arraigned.

OREGON, MO., Sept. 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It has happened that a whole nation has been wrong and one or two men right ere now. Our nation after freeing a whole race it had held under a horrid bondage began to make war on individuals by creating offenses in order to enlarge the dominion of its central authority. When I think that an aged, honest man, a philanthropist and philosopher, was rudely arrested and dragged before a court, tried, sentenced, stripped, shaved, and clad in prison stripes, all in violation of the supreme law of the land, I feel like cursing. And still these crimes go on. The very bar is utterly demoralized. Not one lawyer denounces the wrong. I am a lawyer. I studied forty-five years ago under the best—in the days when we had lawyers—lawyers, like Edward Coke, who could front tyranny to its face, apologize but still insist that king, Lords, and Commons could make no law against the common law, such made law being void as against the common law of the land, and that, too, where no written constitution exists. When our code practice was adopted, old lawyers abandoning practice said, "Mark this! From now on the bar declines, and real lawyers are no more. Case lawyers will increase." I did not believe it; but ten years later I did. Yours truly, CLARKE IRVINE.

Another View of the Case.

KANSAS CITY, KAN., Sept. 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: No difference what opinions you express on any given subject you are bound to displease somebody. Some knight errant of "liberty" or "truth and justice" will break forth in volcanic eruption and pour the lava of their condemnation upon your devoted head. Of course you cannot please everybody, and if you should even attempt to do so ridiculous a thing, I for one would quit your paper. Dr. C. W. M. and F. O. H. hav simply gone off at a half cock. Any "Liberal" who thinks the Kansas City Sun "just as proper a paper to sell or read as THE TRUTH SEEKER or any other paper," must hav a very depraved taste. A man who prefers to eat carrion when sweet, wholesome food comes at the same price, might naturally be expected to slop over in defending the sale of carrion. The natural diversity of individual opinion on any subject is expressed in two small extremes of fanaticism and one large mean of solid ground rationalism. THE TRUTH SEEKER has always marched in the front ranks of the rationalistic section, steering clear of the bottomless bogs and interminable jungles of Utopian sophistries, and I hope it will continue to do so. Liberals want safe, careful teachers and leaders.

We should steer clear of the rocks that wrecked Liberalism in France. Haste is not progress, and unrestricted and unbridled license is not Liberalism. Restraint must be in proportion to ignorance and malevolence—liberty in proportion to development and unfoldment. Cage the tiger, kill the skunk, outlaw the venomous reptil; destroy the thistles, nettles, and briars, but giv the widest liberty to the fragrant flowers, the beautiful song-birds, and the harmless animals.

If all your statements about the Sun hav not been verified in every locality it is owing to the fact that your informants liv in different towns, where local managers and local circumstances hav produced widely different policies and practices.

It is an indisputable fact that the paper in question is a low-down, dirty, vicious publication. It is, in fact, a public nuisance. It is a fundamental principle of law that communities hav a right to protect themselvs against nuisances, and that states must make and enforce laws to that end. Civilization could not exist without that right. Suppose a man should take it into his head to buy a square in the center of a town and go to raising hornets, wasps, yellow-jackets, musketoes, and other pests. Every citizen that goes out of his house is stung. Of course he is unable to bring a suit for damages—he cannot prove whose hornet stung him. The Sun is an adept in its line. With the aid of its attornies it finds many ways to assail, to assault, to villify, to slander, to annoy, and to devil people, and yet escape the law. It sets a watch upon people's private habits and parades them before the public magnified and distorted. It assumes the right to regulate the conduct of every woman, prohibiting her from exercising her own judgment as to whom she may walk or ride with, whom or where entertain, where she may go and how often go out, how she may act, and often how she may or may not keep herself and children from starving. No wife, widow, or maiden in the community but is liable at any time to hav a slop-bucket of Sun slurs and innuendoes emptied upon them. Not necessarily by name but by description or localization.

The nuisance law is the proper and only remedy for this emergency. The Sun man has no more right to maintain a nuisance than anybody else. He is a public enemy, a venomous reptil, a despoiler of individual rights, a sleuth-hound on the trail of every citizen. Swartz had no right to attempt to saddle such a stinking load upon the back of Liberalism. WM. R. SMITH.

Pious Hypocrits with Ill-got Wealth.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Sept. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: If the great reformation of existing social, political, and industrial evils ever triumphs it will be through the workings of Freethought, and Freethinkers must understand that their mission is to fight for the eternal principles of truth, justice, and liberty. The future is like a closed book. We know not where we may drift. If truth and justice and liberty finally prevail over error, injustice, and tyranny, many causes working together will produce the happy effect. Since the formation of the American government the present causes of existing evils first began, though since then up to the last twenty-five years more honesty and justice prevailed than in the last twenty-five years, but in the last quarter of the century causes of wrong worked so rapidly together that to-day the evils are so gigantic that it appalls the heart of considerate, thoughtful, noble men and women. The great fact of nature as plain as the noonday sun is that the entire human race is of a common origin and all embarked on the ocean of life and bound for a common destination, the grave; brothers and sisters as much as one fear of corn is to another ear or one grain of wheat to another. I utterly ignore the bubble of vanity, self-conceit, and haughtiness that characterizes a great many in the world. I bow only to the truth. If absolute truth is to be found, we must be entirely impartial. The man, the woman, who commit themselvs to the worship of truth are on the safest side and the truly reverent. Through evolution nature has molded and produced the human race, also all other forms of animal life. Every person launched into the world is distinctly an individual foreign to another. True liberty has never been and never will be till the majority at least recognize and study the facts of nature and ignore the assumptions of men. The Christian Bible and church command all to love one another. This is the best command. Though there ought to be a universal reciprocity of brotherly feeling with all, yet it is the reverse. Sordid, selfish interest has made so many of the human race in their intense, feverish desire to accumulate wealth totally devoid of any noble purposes in life. It is true, some people exist who are true and noble. All honor to them. But unfortunately in the present state of society the words and deeds, the good seeds of brotherly love and justice, are absorbed and swallowed up in the whirlpool of a vicious, sordid society of the wealthy, fashionable, and exclusiv classes that to-day, like a gigantic octopus, hav the sons and daughters of honest toil almost enslaved. The rich man and woman by this condition of things in their secured advantages of wealth and ease necessarily are to some degree enemies to the poor man and woman. Life is sweet to all, even to the poorest, and there is a cruel, bitter struggle with laboring men and women to earn sufficient money to make a scant living. It has come to be that those dependent only on their labor to preserve their material existence must either wear the yoke of wealth or starve. As I said, many causes hav produced the deplorable conditions. I want the world to understand that I do not believe in the existence of the Christian God. I hav come to my senses thoroughly and can no more be deceived and imposed upon by mere assumptions of men and institutions. If there exists at all a great God, his real enemies are those who profess to love and worship him but do not. They are actual Infidels and hypocrits. As to the wealthy, fashionable professed Christians, as a rule their pretensions are false and their kingdom is of this world. Their hypocrisy and insincerity are to blame for the existing wrongs. Looking at possibilities, there may be a God who has never revealed his existence, hidden and unknown. I do not for an instant doubt that if a great God existed whose attributes were love and justice, he would sustain justice and protect the ignorant and weak against the shrewd and the strong, the innocent against the guilty—in fact, secure the supremacy of all that is true and just. But injustice is triumphant and justice is defeated. The victims of wrong hav no redress, no compensation, for injured innocence; no security for the safety of the individual from the delusions and snares of life. From my honest experience in life's rugged journey, there is no God. This is my conviction, and it is folly and vain to trust in a power that neither heeds nor answers sincere prayers. The real fact is, it is inhumanity of man to man that has enslaved so many. Mere animalism is the motiv of life's devotion. We must blame the sordid selfishness of our own race for the enslavement of labor. The false pious of the churches, society, and state are the guilty. Even ex-Senator Ingalls of Kansas is getting ashamed of his country. In a speech recently delivered at Port Richmond, N. Y., he stated that great wrongs existed, pointing out the fact of the unjust distribution of wealth, saying that results will follow dangerous to society. But he failed to state that this very society is responsible for the wrongs existing. Though he shows a disposition to lay bare the facts of the robbery of the people yet his denunciation and protestation are too light and conservativ. When the truth is known a man cannot be too radical in denouncing deception and wrongs. The ex-Senator said, many men will wake up some day to find their names Dennis. He has been in the American House of Lords and he knows how it is himself. Any considerate, thoughtful, sensible man or woman ought to know that a great God, if he exists by any possibility, could not hav his purposes disregarded and defeated by man, yet this is so. I am a Materialist. I will never believe in the Christian so-called revelation if I ever change my present convictions. I am thoroughly convinced that if there is a God at all he is eminently just and not the God of Christian revelation. Let the believing millions in Christianity understand that God is truth, either personal or impersonal; that error, falseness, is the devil, personal or impersonal. All opposition to truth is evil. Sincere worship of truth is the only reverent worship. And there is no hope for the emancipation of the enslaved, the prevalence of right over might, and a general reformation only by the true civilization of the people. As Ingalls says, we are but children crying in the wilderness, for the odds are overwhelming, and wealth's tide like the ocean's in its unjust distribution strands millions on the barren rocks of poverty. Church and society are every day humbugging the victims of human sordid interests. False pretension of piety with genteel robbery, insidious and secret, has done its baleful work and its ill effect is millionaires and paupers. As Brother Putnam well said in a lecture he delivered here some years ago, let not the true lovers of truth be deceived, for the rich members of churches, as a rule, are false at heart. They parade their piety before the world, but deep down in their hearts their kingdom is of this world, for they neither sell their goods and giv to the poor nor really believe what they pretend to believe. The Freethinkers are the ones true to themselvs and honest in their convictions, and the only class that has ever battled and is now battling for the cause of truth, justice, and liberty. THOMAS J. CONNERS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Blest.

B'est be the tongue that speaks no ill,
Whose words are always true,
That keeps the "law of kindness" still,
Whatever others do.

Blest be the ears that will not hear
Detraction's envious tale;
'Tis only through the list'ning ear
That falsehood can prevail.

Blest be the heart that knows no guile,
That feels no wish unkind,
Forgetting provocation, while
Good deeds are kept in mind.

B'est be the hands that toil to aid
The great world's ceaseless need—
The hands that never are afraid
To do a kindly deed.

—Marion Bernstein.

A Literary Game.

The following game is instructiv, as well as highly interesting, and is apt to please all the young people and their elders too.

Select a number of slips of paper of one size, cards would be better, and let the big sister, who is apt to be the good angel as well, copy on each card a quotation from some author. Each card must be numbered differently, one, two, three, etc., and so on. As she writes the verse, let the best writer among the little ones write the name of the author on another card, numbering it to match the quotation, thus:

"No. 1. Every why hath a wherefore."

The companion card will be:

"No. 1. Shakspere."

These cards, once prepared, will serve for future occasions, and on a rainy day, or winter evening, will prove a blessing to those who wish to furnish a pastime to the children.

Prepare about twenty or twenty-five questions and as many answers, for a small number of children, as the games will be short, and they will hav the fun of winning quickly. Let the little ones seat themselvs in a circle and the "big sister" will deal the cards evenly, after mixing the questions and answers. She will then address the one to her left:

"Who has said: Every why hath a wherefore?"

The one asked will look into his hand, and if among the "answers" he finds "No. 1. Shakspere," will answer, and the trick will be his. Otherwise, the question will be asked again till it reaches the one who holds the No. 1 answer.

It will then be his turn and he will choose any one of his questions, not confining himself to the order of the numbers.

It is well to write "question" over the verse, and "answer" over the author's name.

In a short time the children will become so familiar with the answers that they may discard the "answer" cards altogether. In that case the one who holds "No. 1" will ask his neighbor the author of a quotation, and if he is able to answer from memory he wins the trick. In case he does not remember, it passes along till some one is lucky enough to recollect the author's name, and he is the winner.

In this case it will be necessary to hav some one not playing keep a list near at hand to correct any mistakes. The following list may serve as a guide to those who hav not a collection of favorit quotations, and it may be enlarged or cut down at will:

1. "To all that sow, the time of harvest shall be given" (Whittier).
2. "'Tis only noble to be good" (Tennyson).
3. "I love all who love truth" (Elizabeth B. Browning).
4. "So long as you are innocent fear nothing" (Longfellow).
5. "Our place is kept ready for us to fill" (Adelaide Proctor).
6. "Lofty thoughts and lovely deeds" (Owen Meredith).
7. "Be slow to blame" (Mary Howitt).
8. "King of two hands, he does his part" (Lowell).
9. "Carry learning to its hight" (Emerson).
10. "Use your manners discreetly in all kinds of company" (Shakspere).
11. "Right the day must win" (Faber).
12. "Unspoiled by praise or blame" (T. B. Aldrich).
13. "I hold it sinful to despond" (Celia Thaxter).
14. "His words are bonds" (Shakspere).
15. "All who joy would win must share it. Happiness was born a twin" (Byron).
16. "The first virtue is to temper well thy tongue" (Chaucer).
17. "Wishing, of all employments, is the worst" (Young).
18. "There is no virtue like necessity" (Shakspere).
19. "If you've wronged him, speak him fair" (Holmes).
20. "If it rains, let it rain; we shall not drown" (Alice Carey).

Did the Dog Reason?

Billy Lynch tells a story about a dog he used to own in Chicago, which goes far toward proving that a brute can reason. He had a fine St. Bernard which was a good retriever, and on Sundays would take him about half a block from his house on Indiana avenue and let him carry the papers home he purchased from the newsboy. One morning it was raining, and Billy said he spoke to the dog just as he would to a child, and told him that he didn't care about walking over to the corner, so he might as well take the nickel and go and get the paper. He wrapped a nickel up in a piece of paper and gave it to the dog, which immediately went to the corner and waited for the boy. Billy watched him and saw that he got the paper all right, and was so pleased that the next Sunday he repeated the experiment, and the next Sunday did the same thing.

The following Sunday he overslept himself, and was awakened by a scratching at his window. Getting up he saw that his dog had come out of the back-yard into a little passage-way between his bedroom and a neighboring house and was endeavoring to wake him up. Knowing it was Sunday, he gave the dog a nickel and told him to go and get the paper, which he did. Billy was awake next Sunday, but concluded to see what his dog would do, and, sure enough, it came around to the window and scratched. The next Sunday and the next was tried, and the dog was always on time. Now, whether the dog knew when Sunday came or was aware of the fact by the newsboys being more vociferous on these days is not known, but he was thoroughly tested and would not come to the window except Sundays. Billy thinks that the dog reasoned; that it would be a hard task for anyone to say that he didn't.—Helena, Mont., Independent.

Words of Praise.

Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut, who was one of the most conspicuous men of the country during the administrations of Washington and Adams, seems to hav had at the beginning of his career no expectation of becoming eminent. His ambition was limited to gaining a living for himself, his wife, and family.

But one day, while arguing a case in court, he heard a stranger say: "Who is this young man? He speaks well."

Those words made Ellsworth chief justice of the United States, minister to France, and United States Senator. He went home after court was adjourned, told his wife what he had heard, and began to think of rising at the bar. In his old age, looked up to and respected as a statesman, he used to say that these words were the turning-point of his life.

But young Ellsworth was not only sensible to praise, he was an industrious young man, who did many things which had no reference to the law because it was his duty to do them.

When, after graduating at Princeton, and having become a member of the bar at Hartford, he began to practice law, his father gave him an ax and a wood-lot.

"Oliver," said the old man, who was a pioneer, "if you wish to get ahead, you must work for it."

Oliver settled on the wood-lot, some distance from Hartford, cleared the land, split rails to fence it, built a log-house, and there received the clients who sought him.

When the term of court began he walked down to Hartford, argued his cases, and then returned home to his wood-lot. On coming into court the spectators observed that the young lawyer's hands were swollen and pierced with thorns. That fact did not discredit him with the farmers who served as jurors and witnesses. But after he heard the words of praise, he paid more attention to his books and less to his farm.—Youth's Companion.

Chestnuts.

How good they are! And what fun to gather them just after the first frost! Whizz! bang! goes your stick through the air and down come your chestnuts, fuzzy and briery, but the dear little brown nut lies snugly cuddled inside, waiting for chubby fingers to pick it out and find its great meaty heart.

The chestnut tree grows tall and stately and its leaf is a soft, glossy green and smooth on both sides. It is oblong in shape with serrate edge. The wood of the chestnut tree is light in color and very durable. It is much used in building houses in the finish and in making bedsteads, tables, chairs, and other furniture.

These trees liv to a good old age. There was, it is said, one that stood on Mt. Etna that was very old. No one could tell just its age, and it measured two hundred feet around its body. In England, in Totworth there stood a few years ago, and very likely it is there yet, a great chestnut tree that is said to hav served as a boundary as far back as King John, and that was somewhere between the years 1190 and 1216.

I shall not tell you about the blossom or catkin. You tell it to me, children; tell me, too, about the nut, the prickly burr, and its soft lining, and all about it.

What are chestnuts good for? What a question! To eat, of course. In southern Europe many poor people almost liv upon them. They are good roasted, and some people boil them, and even make them into flour, from which good bread is made. What makes them so sweet? Why, fifteen per cent of them is clear sugar.

In our day, any oft-repeated witticism or story told many times is called "a chestnut."

S. H. W.

Questions:—Describe the chestnut tree, its leaf, its wood. What is the wood used for? What is the age of the chestnut tree? Describe two notable chestnut trees. Tell all you know of the blossom and fruit of the chestnut. Describe the uses of chestnuts. What about "chestnuts" in common conversation?

Theatrical.

The Academy of Music, New York, opened its season Thursday, September 3d, with a romantic, spectacular play called "The Soudan." The story deals with events which occurred during the campaign for the relief of General Gordon and Europeans held prisoners at Khartoum by Arabs during the late Soudan war. The scenes, which are laid in England and Egypt, afford an excellent opportunity for a display of grandeur. The well-known actor, Louis James, plays the leading part. The story allows strong dramatic action, and is well suited to Mr. James's style of acting.

How a Student Makes Money.

Dear Readers: I am able to pay my board and tuition, wear good clothes and hav money in my pocket by spending my odd hours and vacations plating jewelry and tableware and selling platers. I hav made $20 per day, never less than $4. I paid $5 for my plater to H. C. Delno & Co., Columbus, O. Anyone can profit by my experience by writing there for circulars.

The Bible and Evolution.

By Arthur B. Moss.

New and Cheap Edition, - - 50 Cents.

Mentioned by W. E. Gladstone in his work, "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture."

G. W. Foote in the Freethinker recommends it as an excellent text-book. He says: "The manner is good and the style is bright. The reader is carried along on an easy flowing stream of science, history, ethics, and common sense."

Chas. Watts in Secular Thought pronounces it to be the best work the author has written.

And The Truth Seeker says: "This is an excellent book which we can recommend to our readers as clear in language, trustworthy in statement, and irrefutable in reasoning."

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

THE first contingent of the pilgrimage of French workingmen in their address to Leo XIII. said: "We hold inviolate private property, and reject the Socialistic theory of collectiv property, because it is opposed to our interests and contrary to justice," and "We fervently believe that all action exercised outside of the church to right the inequality of labor is not only useless but dangerous to us." They thanked the pope for "reclaiming Sunday as a day of rest which should be so understood in our labor contracts," for "having with a paternal tenderness protected our weakness and destroyed the speculation which aimed at exploiting the forces of the workingman without money," and for "having advised the state to put a stop to all societies tending to immorality and encourage and protect those which incline to the side of religion and the welfare of the working classes." The pope replied that "social and labor questions will never find their true practical solution in purely civil laws. . . . Religion alone, with its revealed dogmas and divine precepts, possesses the right to impose on consciences that perfect justice and charity" which are necessary to solve the labor question. "The solution of all social problems must, therefore, be sought in the action of the church. Avoid perverse men, especially those coming under the name Socialists. Form associations under the patronage of your bishops." The leaders then knelt before the throne and kissed his foot.

Gems of Thought.

IT is said that the creator is omnipotent, and also that he is benevolent. But one proposition contradicts the other. It is said that he is perfect in power, and that he is also perfect in purity. We shall show that he cannot possibly be both. The conduct of a father toward his child appears to be cruel, but it is not cruel in reality. He beats the child, but he does it for the child's own good: he is not omnipotent; he is therefore obliged to choose between two evils. But the creator is omnipotent; he therefore chooses cruelty as a means of education or development; he therefore has a preference for cruelty, or he would not choose it; he is therefore fond of cruelty or he would not prefer it, he is therefore cruel.—Reade.

CHRISTIANITY has driven more men and women crazy than all other religions combined. Hundreds and thousands and millions hav lost their reason contemplating the monstrous falsehoods of Christianity.—Ingersoll.

THE enlightened reason of man is the only interpreter of Nature's laws, and physical theories handed down from remote antiquity hav simply no claim whatever upon our acceptance in the present day.—Professor Youmans.

I WOULD say to my brother the Turk: Let us eat together a good hen with rice, invoking Allah; your religion seems to me very respectable; you adore but one God; you are obliged to giv the fortieth part of your revenue every day in alms, and to be reconciled with your enemies on the day of the bairam. Our bigots, who calumniate the world, hav said a hundred times, that your religion succeeded only because it was wholly sensual. They hav lied, poor fellows! Your religion is very austere; it commands prayer five times a day; it imposes the most rigorous fast; it denies you the wine and the liquors which our spiritual directors encourage; and if it only permits four wives to those who can support them (who are very few) it condemns by this restriction the Jewish incontinence, which allowed eighteen wives to the homicide David, and seven hundred to Solomon, the assassin of his brother, without reckoning concubines.—Voltaire.

As knowledge and wisdom increase, all theological contrivances lose their credit and efficacy.—Abner Kneeland.

SANITARY authorities hav in half a century done far more to reduce the rate of disease and death than has been done in fifteen hundred years by all the fetiches which theological reasoning could devise or ecclesiastical power enforce.—Prof. A. D. White.

NOTHING is arbitrary in the action of nature, implying an exceptional discrimination. Just so many accidents of a given kind occur during certain periods under similar circumstances. The number of suicides in London in each decade and the number of misdirected letters in certain periods is about the same. There is no event in the world of mind or matter which it is not easier to account for as the result of natural consequences than as being the direct act in each case of a superintending God.—Adams.

WE are able to-day to take stock of our resources as we never were before, and the most cursory examination shows that the resources are practically infinit. The history of the world is at last an open book, and the task of summing up is trifling. We see that the old myths of the impotence of man are laughable monstrosities, interesting only as mementoes of his early helplessness. A thousand arts hav picked him up out of the isolation of the past, and brought him into the closest contact with his fellows. Thus he has learned his strength and theirs; he has mastered the virtue of self-reliance and discovered the power that combination givs. That character, forged in the furnace of a long and sturdy struggle, will never desert him; that knowledge, so laboriously acquired, he will never forget. It may be that a sharp shock or two will be required to wake the sleeper; that the chrysalis may be burst with painful effort. But that it will be burst is as certain as to-morrow's dawn. The momentum already acquired by the human race is irresistible; ni prêtre ni maitre, neither priest nor master, can hope to bar the way.—W. Owen.

RELIGIOUS TWINS.

Notes and Clippings.

A NEW clerical champion of the ballet is the Rev. William Stephen Craiger, a rector in Manchester. He looks upon the ballet as an artistic drama with a distinct plot and well-defined characters. The dancer's dress is traditional and intended to allow free play to the limbs. Good ballet dancing is as beautiful in its way as music, and the average morality of ballet-dancers is about as good as that in other branches of female labor.

"CONGRESS made the country ridiculous when it appropriated money for General Dyrenforth's absurd experiments in rain-making. If it had questioned science on the subject it would hav learned very positivly that the theory of General Dyrenforth is not only without a leg of fact or principle to stand on, but is rendered absurd by facts of science of which there can be neither doubt nor dispute." Thus far the World. For our part, we hope that the statements will not turn out to be true.

GENERAL WOLSELEY says: "There is commonly a false surprise expressed when any general of ability is found who can write well. Why this should be so I know not, for most of the great commanders wrote remarkably well. King David, Xenophon, Cæsar, Monticuculli, Berwick, Marshal Saxe, Frederick the Great, Napoleon, Wellington, and a host of minor lights in all countries hav left us a great deal that for all ages will be highly thought of." Will the general kindly tell us what writings of King David he knows of?

THIS reflection closes Colonel Ingersoll's remarks on his will case in Montana: "How beautiful the generosity, the hospitality of childhood. But as they grow old there comes the love of gold, and the love of gold seems to hav the same effect upon the heart that it does upon the country where it is found. All the roses fade, and the beautiful green trees lose their leaves, and there is nothing in the heart but sage-brush. And so it is with the land that holds within its miserly grip of rocks what we call precious metals."

TWENTY-ONE years ago to-day, says the Herald of September 20th, troops entered Rome. The temporal power of the pope thereupon came to an end. This is therefore an anniversary of mingled sorrow and rejoicing to Italians the world over. The conservativs, who feel that the head of the church should be clothed in the gorgeous robes of political prerogativ as well as the humbler garb of religion, regard the day as mournfully significant. It reminds them that the holy father has been robbed of privileges which his predecessors held for centuries. The more radical, however, celebrate the event with pomp and ceremonial.

THE situation of the Jews under the Russian religious persecution is far more terrible than the outside world imagins, and its miseries now literally defy adequate description. They can best be compared with the sufferings of poor non-combatants in provinces being overrun by a hostil and mercenary army in medieval times. Even this parallel fails, for there is no possible solace in the hope that the invaders will go away again. It is the Jew who is going to be driven with his family from his home, forced to abandon everything not portable, dependent very often upon charity for even his railway ticket to Old Poland, and absolutely without resources or plans for the future. This is what is happening to scores of thousands of people in every part of Russia east of the pale. What is happening inside the pale is too dreadful to dwell upon.

WHILE the ministers are clamoring for closing the World's Fair on Sunday, it seems they can't agree on Sunday observance between themselvs. The Cumberland Presbyterian synod has been in session in San Antonio, Tex., and at a late hour on the night of final adjournment, a resolution was offered censuring ministers who had gone home on a Sunday train. A bitter debate resulted, the dispatches tell us, one minister suggesting that those who rode on the street-cars ought to be included in the censure. The resolution as offered, which reads as follows, was finally adopted: "Resolved, That this body deplores the seeming or real necessity of any of its members violating the sanctity of the Sabbath by returning to their homes by public conveyance on the Sabbath, and that it is the mind of this body that such conduct is dishonoring to God, and should in every way be discouraged." It is difficult to understand, says the Denison Gazetteer, why the resolution should designate "public" conveyance. Where the distinction, for instance, between hiring a hack and driving your own horse? In one case some one else does the labor and in the other you labor yourself. These regulators of other people hav queer ideas of consistency.

WHAT the Reformed Presbyterians think they believe: "When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, in 1789," said Rev. J. M. Foster, "Reformed Presbyterians protested against its immoral character. They refused to unite with the political body of voters in accepting authority under it. They hav ever since denied themselvs the political privileges of voting or holding office. They cannot conscientiously swear to support the Constitution: First, because it does not recognize God as Sovereign, Christ as ruler of nations, and the Bible as fountain of all law. The nation is the creature of God. It is a moral person. It is responsible to God for its character. Our Constitution does not contain the name of God. Second, because the Constitution contains provisions that are contrary to the law of God. 'We the people' are the highest authority, the ultimate appeal. But Christ claims this. 'By me kings reign and princes decree justice.' Both cannot be supreme. When the president is inaugurated 'he shall swear or affirm.' Every president after George Washington and before R. B. Hayes took the presidential oath without an appeal to God. The Bible says: 'Thou shalt fear the Lord, and swear by his name.' Still further, 'No religious test shall be required as a qualification for office.' The Bible rule is, 'Choose out able men, men of truth, fearing God and hating covetousness, and place such to be rulers over you.' Third, because political dissent is the only way in which we can free ourselvs from responsibilities for the national evils. Fourth, because political dissent is the best remedy that can be applied to these national evils." If it is really as bad as this the saints should emigrate.

Victory in Washington!

THE BIBLE CANNOT BE READ IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Attorney General Jones has just mailed to the state superintendent of public instruction an exhaustiv opinion upon the constitutionality of the Bible reading in the public schools.

His opinion was called out by a note of inquiry from the superintendent.

He finds that the Bible cannot be read in the public schools without a violation of certain provisions of the constitution. Following is his opinion:

HON R. B. BRYAN, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Olympia, Wash.—Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your communication of recent date, submitting for my official opinion the following inquiry:

"Can a teacher employed in the common schools of this state, without violating any law of the state, or any provision of the state constitution, conduct devotional or religious exercises at the opening of the school day, or during any part of the school day as prescribed by law, by the singing of hymns or other sacred music, or by reading passages from the Bible, without comment, or by repeating or causing to be repeated, without comment, what is usually known as the Lord's prayer?"

The question which you hav submitted to me is one of so much interest to the people of the state at large, and is fraught with so much consequence to the present and future weal of our common school system, that I hav felt justified in taking a considerable length of time to make a rather extended and careful investigation of the subject.

PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The provisions of our own constitution which hav a bearing on this question are:

Section 11, Article 1, of the constitution, which is as follows:

SECTION 11. Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual, and no one shall be molested or disturbed in person or property, on account of religion; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the state. No public money or property shall be appropriated for, or applied to any religious establishment. No religious qualifications shall be required for any public office or employment, nor shall any person be incompetent as a witness or juror, in consequence of his opinion on matters of religion, nor be questioned in any court of justice touching his religious belief to affect the weight of his testimony.

Section 4 of Article 9, as follows:

SEC 4 All schools maintained or supported wholly or in part by the public funds shall be forever free from sectarian control or influence.

The first subdivision of the compact with the United States found in Article 26, as follows:

First, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured and that no inhabitant of this state shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

And the fourth subdivision of said compact as follows: Fourth—Provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of systems of public schools free from sectarian control which shall be open to all the children of said state.

The sections of the statute to which you refer me, viz, Sections 42, 46, and 51 of chapter XII, hav no particular bearing upon the question. The only part of either of the sections which seems to relate in any manner to this subject is that part of Section 51 which simply repeats the language of Section 4 of Article 9 of the constitution, and adds no further force or effect to these provisions.

NO UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

From an examination of the provisions on the subject of religion found in the Constitution of the United States and in the constitution of the several states of the Union, it will be noticed that at the very outset the people of this country declared with singular unanimity against the union of religion with the government.

A large proportion of the early inhabitants of this country were driven from their nativ homes by religious persecution and sought an asylum in a savage wilderness, preferring hardships, privation, and danger rather than to submit to any interference with their right to worship almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences. To Massachusetts came the Puritans; to Rhode Island, the Baptists; to the Carolinas, the Huguenots; to Maryland, the Catholics; to Pennsylvania, the Quakers; while other denominations established themselvs in different localities where they could enjoy this inestimable privilege, either alone or in comity with other tolerant sects.

It was, no doubt, with a full consideration of the heterogeneous elements composing our nation and the memory of the persecutions of their ancestors, that the people of all the states adopted constitutional safeguards against religious intolerance, and all but two of the original thirteen states declared a complete divorce between the government and creed.

And the first work of the first session of Congress was to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This amendment was not only unnecessary, but was conceded by the Congress which proposed it to be unnecessary, for the reason that Congress had no power to make any such law, unless expressly or by necessary implication authorized so to do. But they were unwilling to leave this question open to argument or implication, and refused to be satisfied until the fundamental law contained an express declaration to that effect.

IT IS A GROWING SENTIMENT.

An examination of all the state constitutions will disclose the further fact that the sentiment of the people to make the divorce between church and state, between government and creed, between politics and religion, more complete and absolute has been one of constant and unvarying growth. While the early constitutions were not very radical upon this question, some of them even countenancing a limited union between church and state, the later constitutions hav in almost every instance incorporated into themselvs provisions and declarations more radical, sweeping, and comprehensiv than their predecessors.

This marked and constant growth indicates with great emphasis that the people were not satisfied with the loose and indefinit provisions of the early constitutions, and were unwilling to leave open a way for the insidious invasion of public affairs by religious sectarianism through the avenue of judicial construction and interpretation.

This growth of public sentiment has continued until the adoption of our own constitution, the provisions of which on this subject are as broad, if not broader, and more positiv and more comprehensiv than similar provisions in any of the other state constitutions.

This growth does not, however, indicate a decrease in religious sentiment among the people; these provisions hav not been the work of the enemies but of the friends of religion. It is not that the men who framed and the people who adopted these constitutional enactments were wanting in reverence for the Bible and respect and veneration for the sublime and pure morality taught therein, but because they were unwilling that any avenue should be left open for the invasion of the right of absolute freedom of conscience in religious affairs; because they were unwilling that any man should be required, directly or indirectly, to contribute toward the promulgation of any religious creed, doctrin, or sentiment to which his conscience did not lend full assent.

IF THE BIBLE THEN THE KORAN.

It was with this idea in view that the provisions of Section 11 (supra) were framed. There can be no doubt that the words "religion" and "religious," as used in that section, apply to all forms of religion and religious worship and belief, and that as a test of qualification for public office, or to affect the weight of his testimony as a witness in judicial proceedings, its provisions equally protect the disciple of Abraham, of Mohammed, of Confucius, and of Jesus; and that within the meaning of that section each is a member of a distinct religious sect or denomination.

The supreme court of the state of Ohio, in the case of Board of Education vs. Minor, 23 Ohio state, emphatically asserts this construction of a similar provision in the constitution of that state.

The Protestant Christian founds his religion upon the King James version of the Bible; the Catholic Christian founds his on the Douay version, the Hebrew on the Talmud, and the Mohammedan on the Koran. Each of these books is distinctivly a religious book, and the stated reading of either of them as a part of the school curriculum would seem to be clearly, not only a religious, but a sectarian exercise and instruction.

The fact that the great majority of the people of this state are Christians cannot in any way affect this question; for if there were only one Christian in the state, that one Christian would be equally entitled to the protection of that constitutional guaranty as he is under existing circumstances, and it would be a cowardly court that would refuse to extend it to him simply because he was in the minority.

DOES THE CONSTITUTION FORBID?

But does the conclusion that the stated reading of the Bible in the public schools is religious or sectarian worship or instruction lead to the further conclusion that it is in violation of any part of the constitutional provisions above cited?

The school building as well as the time of the teacher during school hours belong to the public, both are public property, both are paid for by taxation, the burden of which bears equally upon the Protestant, the Catholic and the Hebrew; and I can not resist the conclusion that in the time occupied in such reading both are applied to religious exercises and instruction.

Fortunately, we are not without authority on this question. In the case of State vs. District No. 8, decided by the supreme court of the state of Wisconsin in March 1890, see 44 N. W. Reporter, page 967, it was held

First. That the stated reading of the King James version of the Bible in the public schools, without comment, was "sectarian instruction" within the meaning of Section 3, Article 10, Wisconsin constitution.

Second. That it constituted the school a place of worship within the meaning of Section 18, Article 1. Id.

Third. That it constituted the school a religious seminary within the meaning of Section 18. Id.

This authority is entitled to very great weight and respect, not only on account of the eminence of that court, but on account of the thorough consideration which the case received at its hands. Three eminent jurists, Justices Lyon, Cassoday and Orton, each wrote opinions in the case in which the entire court concurred.

THE WISCONSIN CONSTITUTION.

The constitutional provisions of Wisconsin which that court construed in that case are as follows:

The right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed; nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship; nor shall any control of or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted, or any preference be given by law to any religious establishments or modes of worship. Const. Art. 1, Sec. 18 No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification for any office of public trust under the state, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to giv evidence in any court of law or equity in consequence of his opinions on the subject of religion. Id. Sec. 19. The interest of the school fund "and all other revenues derived from the school lands, shall be exclusivly applied," etc., "to the support and maintenance of common schools in each school district," etc. Id. Art. 10. Sec. 2. Subd. 1.

"The legislature shall provide by law for the establishment of district schools, which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable; and such schools shall be free, and without charge for tuition, to all children between the ages of 4 and 20 years; and no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein." Id. Sec. 3.

"Each town and city shall be required to raise by tax annually for the support of common schools therein a sum not less," etc. Id. Sec. 4. "Provision shall be made by law for the distribution of the income of the school fund among the several towns and cities of the state for the support of common schools therein," etc. Id. Sec. 5

IT IS SECTARIAN INSTRUCTION.

With respect to the first proposition above, viz.: that reading the Bible in the public schools is sectarian instruction within the meaning of the Wisconsin constitution, Justice Lyon says, on page 973:

The question therefore, seems to narrow down to this: Is the reading of the Bible in the schools—not merely selected passages therefrom, but the whole of it—sectarian instruction of the pupils? In view of the fact already mentioned, that the Bible contains numerous doctrinal passages, upon some of which the peculiar creed of almost every religious sect is based, and these passages may reasonably be understood to inculcate the doctrins predicated upon them, an affirmativ answer to the question seems unavoidable. Any pupil of intelligence who listens to the doctrinal portions of the Bible will be more or less instructed thereby in the doctrins of the divinity of Jesus Christ, the eternal punishment of the wicked, the authority of the priesthood, the binding force and efficacy of the sacraments, and many other conflicting sectarian doctrins. A most forcible demonstration of the accuracy of this statement is found in certain reports of the American Bible Society of its work in Catholic countries, (referred to in one of the arguments) in which instances are given of the conversion of several persons from "Romanism" through the reading of the scriptures alone: that is to say the reading of the Protestant or King James version of the Bible converted Catholics to Protestants without the aid of comment or exposition. In those cases the reading of the Bible certainly was sectarian instruction.

When the provisions of Section 3, Article 10, of the Wisconsin constitution are compared with the language of Section 4, Article 9, of our own constitution, it must be conceded that the provisions of our own constitution are far more sweeping and comprehensiv than the provisions construed in that case. That provision says, "and no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein," while the provisions of our own constitution say, "All schools maintained or supported wholly or in part by the public funds shall be forever free from sectarian control or influence."

If the whole vocabulary of the English language were exhausted, it would be difficult to frame an expression which would indicate on the part of the people of the state more clearly and emphatically an intention to abolish everything which had even the slightest taint of sectarianism from the public schools.

MAKES THE SCHOOL A PLACE OF WORSHIP.

In holding that the stated reading of the Bible in the public schools constitutes such school "a place of worship" and a "religious seminary" within the meaning of the constitution and laws of the state of Wisconsin, Justice Cassoday, on pages 979 and 980, uses the following language:

If then, such reading of the Bible is worship, can there be any doubt but what the schoolroom in which it is so statedly read is a "place of worship" within the meaning of the same clause in the constitution? Counsel seem to argue that such place of worship should be confined to some church edifice, or places where the members of a church statedly worship. Some of the earlier constitutions, having similar clauses, used the word "building" and "church." Manifestly, the words "place of worship" were advisedly used as applicable to any "place" or structure where worship is statedly held, and which the citizen is compelled to attend, or the taxpayers are compelled to erect and support. The mere fact that only a small fraction of the school hours is devoted to such worship, in no way justifies such use, as against an objecting taxpayer. If the right be conceded, then the length of time so devoted becomes a matter of discretion. If such right does not exist, then any length of time, however short, is forbidden. The relators, as taxpayers of the district, were compelled to aid in the erection of the school building in question, and also to aid in the support of the school maintained therein. Secs. 430, 430a, San. & B. Ann. st. Being thus compelled to aid in such erection and support, they hav a legal right to object to its being used as a place of worship. In fact, it has been held that it can be devoted to no other use, as against an objecting taxpayer.

The question thus recurs whether the money thus drawn from the state treasury for the maintenance and support of the school in question is for the benefit of a religious seminary, within the meaning of this clause of the constitution. A seminary is defined by Webster as a place of training; institution of education; a school, academy, college, or university, in which young persons are instructed in the several branches of learning which may qualify them for their future employments. It manifestly includes institutions of learning or education of different grades. But a religious seminary of any one grade is just as effectually forbidden as a religious seminary of any higher or other grade. The thing that is prohibited is the drawing of any money from the state treasury for the benefit of any religious school. If the stated reading of the Bible in the school as a text-book is not only in a limited sense, worship, but also instruction, as it manifestly is, then there is no escape from the conclusion that it is religious instruction; and hence the money so drawn from the state treasury was for the benefit of a religious school, within the meaning of this clause of the constitution.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS ARE GODLESS.

Justice Orton, in construing the provisions of the Wisconsin constitution, says, on pages 981 and 982:

The clause that no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein was inserted ex industria to exclude everything pertaining to religion. They are called by those who wish to hav not only religion, but their own religion, taught therein "Godless schools." They are Godless, and the educational department of the government is Godless, in the same sense that the executiv, legislativ, and administrativ departments are Godless. So long as our constitution remains as it is, no one's religion can be taught in our public schools. By religion I mean religion as a system; not religion in the sense of natural law. Religion in the latter sense is the source of all law and government, justice and truth. Religion as a system of belief cannot be taught without offense to those who hav their own peculiar views of religion, no more than it can be without offense to the different sects of religion. How can religion, in this sense, be taught in the common schools without taxing the people for or on account of it? The onlv object, purpose, or use for taxation by law in this state must be exclusivly secular. There is no such source and cause of strife, quarrels, fights, malignant opposition, persecution, and war, and all evil in the state as religion. Let it once enter into our civil affairs, our government would soon be destroyed. Let it once enter into our common schools, they would be destroyed. Those who made our constitution saw this, and used the most apt and comprehensiv language in it to prevent such a catastrophe. It is said if reading the Protestant version of the Bible in school is offensiv to the parents of some of the scholars, and antagonistic to their own religious views, the children can retire. They ought not to be compelled to go out of the school for such a reason for one moment. The suggestion itself concedes the whole argument. That version of the Bible is hostil to the belief of many who are taxed to support the common schools, and who hav equal rights and privileges in them. It is a source of religious and sectarian strife. That is enough. It violates the letter and the spirit of the constitution. No state constitution ever existed that so completely excludes and precludes the possibility of religious strife in the civil affairs of the state, and yet so fully protects all alike in the enjoyment of their own religion. All sects and denominations may teach the people their own doctrins in all proper places. Our constitution protects all and favors none. But they must keep out of the common schools and civil affairs. It requires but little argument to prove that the Protestant version of the Bible, or any other version of the Bible, is the source of religious strife and opposition, and opposed to the religious belief of many of our people. It is a sectarian book. The Protestants were a very small sect in religion at one time, and they are a sect yet, to the great Catholic church, against whose usages they protested, and so is their version of the Bible sectarian as against the Catholic version of it. The common school is one of the most indispensable, useful, and valuable civil institutions this state has. It is democratic, and free to all alike, in perfect equality, where all the children of our people stand on a common platform, and may enjoy the benefits of an equal and common education. An enemy to our common schools is an enemy to our state government. It is the same hostility that would cause any religious denomination that had acquired the ascendency over all others, to remodel our constitution and change our government, and all of its institutions, so as to make them favorable only to itself, and exclude all others from their benefits and protection. In such an event, religious and sectarian instruction will be given in all schools. Religion needs no support from the state. It is stronger and much purer without it.

The case is important and timely. It brings before the courts a case of the plausible, insidious, and apparently innocent entrance of religion into our civil affairs, and of an assault upon the most valuable provisions of the constitution. Those provisions should be pondered and heeded by all of our people, of all nationalities, of all denominations of religion, who desire the perpetuity and value the blessings of our free government. That such is their meaning and interpretation no one can doubt, and it requires no citation of authorities to show it. It is religion and sectarian instruction that are excluded by them. Morality and good conduct may be inculcated in the common schools and should be. The connection of church and state corrupts religion and makes the state despotic.

FREE FROM SECTARIAN INFLUENCE.

If the word religion, as used in the bill of rights, includes the religion of the Catholic, Protestant, the Hebrew, and the Mohammedan, and each of them is a religious sect within the meaning of the constitutional provision, the conclusion is irresistible that that school is subjected to sectarian influence in which religious exercises are conducted by the reading of the religious book on which the doctrins of the one or the other of these religious sects is based.

It is worthy of observation that the people of this state were not satisfied with the fourth subdivision of the compact with the United States, which simply provides that the common schools shall be free from "sectarian control," and added the words "or influence" to that provision ex industria, when they framed Section 4, Article 9, supra.

These people no doubt had in mind the fact that the introduction of religious worship in any form into the common schools was too often the source of bitter and malignant controversies between those who favored and those who objected to the particular form employed, and no doubt one of their purposes in enacting these stringent provisions was to emancipate the pupils in our common schools from the baneful influences of such unseemly controversies.

KANSAS AND IOWA CASES.

I cannot dismiss this subject without calling attention to a few other cases which hav a bearing on this question. In the case of Spencer vs. District No. 6, 15 Kansas, 202, it was held to be in violation of the law of that state to use a school-house for a religious meeting when school was not in session.

The court says on page 204: "The public school-house cannot be used for any private purposes. The argument is a short one. Taxation is invoked to raise funds to erect the building; but taxation is illegitimate to apply for any private purpose. Taxation will not lie to raise funds to build a place for a religious society, a political society, or a social club. What cannot be done directly cannot be done indirectly. As you may not levy taxes to build a church, no more may you levy taxes to build a school-house and then lease it for a church."

In the case of Moore vs. Monroe, decided by the supreme court of Iowa, 20 N. W. Reporter, page 475, the constitutionality of a law providing that the Bible should "not be excluded from any school or institution in the state" was called in question. The constitutional provision which it was claimed to violate is as follows: "The general assembly shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; nor shall any person be compelled to attend any place of worship, pay tithes, taxes, or other rates for building or repairing places of worship, or the maintenance of any minister or ministry."

The court held that the law did not violate the constitution, but says on page 476: "It is, perhaps, not to be denied that the principle, carried out in its extreme logical results, might be sufficient to sustain the appellant's position."

When the comparativly narrow provisions of the Iowa constitution are compared with the broad and sweeping terms of our own, and it is further considered how reluctant courts are to override the legislativ will by declaring a law unconstitutional, the words of the Iowa court become pregnant with import, and leave little room to doubt that that court would hav held the law obnoxious to such provisions as are found in our constitution.

In Millard vs. the Board of Education, 10 N. E. Reporter, 669, the supreme court of Illinois says: "The schools hav not been established to aid any sectarian denomination, or assist in disseminating any sectarian doctrin, and no board of education or school directors hav any authority to use the public funds for any such purpose."

In the case of State vs. Halleck, 16 Nevada, 373, it was held that public funds could not be appropriated to the Nevada Orphan Asylum, a school in which religious exercises of a sectarian character were conducted.

Numerous other questions hav been examined which hav some relation to this question, but they are founded on constitutional provisions so different from our own that their discussion would be unprofitable.

CONCERNING SACRED SONGS.

But one question remains to be considered; your inquiry includes the singing of sacred songs. The term "sacred songs" is too vague and indefinit to be susceptible of an exact definition, and it would be impossible for me to say whether or not the singing of songs might or might not be a violation of the principles of the constitution.

Sacred songs are ordinarily poetry of moral and elevating character set to music, and ordinarily speaking hav no sectarian tendencies. Many of them are enjoyed indiscriminately by all denominations, sects and creeds who use a common language.

There is no doubt that a teacher by the systematic selection of such sacred songs as do hav a sectarian tendency and causing them to be sung in the public schools as a religious and devotional exercise, might be guilty of a violation of the constitution; but it is equally manifest that the pupils of our common schools may hav the pleasure and the benefit of many if not most of such songs and the provisions of our constitution be in nowise infringed.

I hav the honor to be, very respectfully yours,
W. C. JONES, Attorney-General.

Fifteenth Annual Congress.

The Fifteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the Board of Directors to meet in Philadelphia, on Saturday morning, Oct. 31, 1891, at 10 o'clock, in Industrial Hall, corner of Broad and Wood streets, for the transaction of business, and to continue over Sunday, November 1st, if the Congress shall so determin. No arrangements will be made for reduced railway or hotel rates.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal right in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution, rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons of whatever faith to its membership on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in its broadest sense, as applied to the state and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Materialists, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, Progressiv Jews, and Liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and Puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platforms and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as upon the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or women, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

All who work for religious liberty are welcome to the coming Congress of the American Secular Union in the City of Brotherly Love. R B. WESTBROOK,
President American Secular Union.

News and Notes.

Palouse country is one of the great wheat sections of the world. It is the opening of this vast territory of eastern Washington that has helped to build up Tacoma and the sound. The Great Northern railroad now building is verging in this direction in order to gather its enormous harvests. Unless it goes forty bushels to the acre it is not considered that there is an average crop. Whether these immense wheat fields will continue to produce in undiminished luster is a question of time. So far as one can judge from present appearances these rolling prairies will not only produce the flour but will "take the cake."

Palouse City is one of the most charming locations in this beautiful land. It has a plucky and business-like people. They don't trust in providence. They make their own way.

On the day of my arrival there was a splendid band tournament, and the whistle of the locomotiv mingled with exhilarating strains. Palouse can boast of two bands, one of them a young ladies' band, which makes a brilliant appearance in its golden uniform. As there was but one large hall in the town, my lecture on Saturday evening was deferred in order that the Palouse cornet band might giv a ball in honor of the occasion. It was a most successful affair. Fair women and brave men circled in the glorious dance and those who were there didn't stop at midnight but broke the Sabbath day with the "light fantastic toe."

I lectured on Sunday afternoon and evening to the biggest audience I hav met anywhere. In the evening every seat was occupied and it seemed as if nearly all present were in hearty accord with Liberal ideas. Evidently the majority of the people are outside the ecclesiastical pale. The farmers in this country as well as the business men are generally to the front.

W. L. Farnsworth I first met at Medina, O., when with Charles Watts the campaign for the Secular Union was opened six years ago. I shall always remember the midnight ride of eighteen miles which we took in the wintry weather after the lecture at Medina to catch the morning train for Cleveland. Farnsworth has obeyed the injunction of Greeley since that time and come West. He is just the man for this live country. He has built up a large business and is making money. He is one of the foremost citizens of Palouse. He has never concealed his Freethought principles. He is an earnest supporter of our work. Mrs. Krekel began the campaign here last year with great success and through her lectures the Liberals discovered their strength. Mr. Farnsworth's little boy died a few months before that time. The father would not hav a clergyman to officiate at the funeral. Judge Buck, of Lewiston, was sent for and came and delivered a most appropriate address. The Christians thought this a most "terrible thing," but Mr. Farnsworth found many friends he knew not of before who thanked him for his courageous vindication of Freethought. I had the pleasure of climbing "the hill of Zion" to his genial fireside and during my stay in Palouse enjoyed the hospitality of his home. Palouse seems to be built on about as many hills as Rome. There are seven, if not more, and it gives the city a variable and picturesque aspect. On one of these hills is Mr. Farnsworth's dwelling. After you hav mounted the "steep incline" a lovely prospect spreads around, the folding hills opening to the vast prairies, to mountainous peaks and the shining horizon.

Mr. R. Pfaendtner is another stalwart Liberal. He was burnt out two years ago when Palouse was nearly destroyed, and not only lost all he had but was hundreds of dollars in debt. He did not plead the "baby act" but simply went to work and paid what he owed, cent for cent. He had no "Jesus" to help him on that lay-out, only his own grit. He is not afraid of his colors. He is an unflinching Liberal every time. I am obliged to his daughter, who has the youthful enthusiasm of Freethought, for the beautiful bouquets furnished for the platform, and I believe that she will one day be a representativ of our cause in the field of oratory.

Orcutt, a pioneer of the coast, has hunted deer many a time where now are the busy streets of Palouse. He has taught school in Walla Walla and vicinity, but I guess he never prayed or read the Bible. He is a Freethinker from the word go. His reminiscences of this frontier life are exceedingly interesting. His son, Peter L. Orcutt, enrolls himself on THE TRUTH SEEKER list. Frank Briley and John Drew, of Garfield, Wash., are also there. Dr. D. A. Clark joins. Mr. Anderson is already there, and his whole family are heart and soul in the ranks of reform. Mr. Anderson introduced me at the meetings. There are many others with whom I had the pleasure of acquaintance, a long roll of comradeship whose generous welcome I shall not forget.

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Hubbard were present from Pullman, a distance of twenty miles. I hear good words of Pullman—that there are Liberals in it—and I hope on my next round to visit the place. At any rate, I hav a cordial invitation to the home of our friends, and I desire to go. Mr. Hubbard put 190 acres into wheat this season and takes to market 7,700 bushels. He bought 80 acres this year for $2,000 and has cleared enough off his farm to clear the debt. This is profitable. One of Mr. Hubbard's neighbors raised 84 bushels to the acre, and the boss acre in Whitman county produced 101 bushels and 11 pounds. I guess this beats the world. This abundant yield, testified to by over thirty persons, was exhibited at Spokane Exposition and will be also exhibited at World's Fair.

Well, I could say more about Palouse country if I had time—but it's a big country and there are big-hearted Liberals in it, and our flag flies, and there's music in its mighty fields.

Monday morning I leave Palouse, and arrive at Spokane about noon. As I am obliged on account of railroad connections to remain over Spokane one night I had sent word to Mr. Scurlock to secure the Unitarian church where I had delivered a lecture on the previous Monday evening for a lecture this Monday evening, September 21st, on "The Religious Conspiracy." What was my surprise on arriving at Pacific Hotel, Spokane, to receive word as follows from my friend: "Could not get church. As Unitarians they could not harbor downright Infidelity. Individually they might hav broader views." Think of this for a Unitarian church! The defense of human rights, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of our country, are "downright Infidelity" to the Unitarians of Spokane. There was not one word in my discourse but what was indorsed by the Unitarian clergyman, not one word but what would be indorsed by the vast majority of the Unitarians of Spokane. I was dealing with an important question. I was not expressing my own creed; I was simply advocating the total separation of church and state, without reference to belief, and this all-important question must be excluded from the Unitarian church. Save me from the Unitarian church of Spokane. It is allied with bigotry. No plea for universal human rights in its pulpit. What a motley dress the Unitarians do wear. You do not know by its uniform where to find that church. It has a coat of many colors. But after all, when it comes to a test, the Unitarian churches are with the other churches. Amid all its flowers are the iron bands of an inflexible creed. Its pulpit is hedged in, its clergymen are chained. The rights of man are "downright Infidelity." Are the Unitarians much ahead of the Catholics?

I shall lecture in Spokane again some time, not, however, in the Unitarian church, but on a platform broad as nature, science, humanity, and freedom.

It is quite a leap from Spokane to Victoria, but here I am to-day on the soil of British Columbia. I leave Spokane Tuesday morning. Over the mighty river and the arid plains, where the winds howl and raise a dust, we go on over the stupendous peaks and crags of the Cascades—thundering through the tunnel, winding through the forests, circling down the mountain, and at midnight behold the far-flashing lights of Tacoma, billowing in the waters of the sound. From Tacoma the journey winds to Seattle, the Naples of the West—brilliant on its hillsides fronting the resplendent sea. Then the great steamer in the soft and gorgeous sunshine of September plows the shining expanse and tumbles the waters into a million jewels. We pass Pt. Townsend. I hav the good fortune to meet John Iffland of that place, who orders Freethought books to keep the world a-moving with the spirit of progress. In the afternoon I reach Victoria. As we sail into the splendid harbor the most imposing building on the shore is Hotel Dallas, where our good friend W. Jensen givs welcome to the traveling world. Hotel Dallas is one of the most elegant buildings on the sound. It was opened on the 1st of September.

I wend my way to the Occidental near the wharf. Berryman & Andrews, proprietors, giv solid and generous entertainment. It is a Liberal household here, and our friends are not afraid to wear the badge of Freethought. Even the orthodox clergymen are not averse to register here. They know they can get a square meal and etceteras if they so desire. One clergyman of solemn aspect inquired of Berryman what were his rates to clergymen. Berryman replied candidly that he didn't charge a clergyman any more than he did anybody else. The clergyman saw the point, smiled acquiescence, and paid his bill like other folks.

In the evening, Thursday, September 24th, I call upon Mr. and Mrs. Jensen. Mrs. Jensen was in England when I lectured last spring. She was an intelligent and graceful lady, well fitted to preside in the palatial hotel so convenient and luxurious in its appointments. Mr. Jensen has shown a wonderful amount of enterprise in building this hotel. I do not believe any other man in Victoria would hav dared to hav done it. It is not built in the business portion of the city where hotels usually are, but just in the suburbs, on the shore of the bay, commanding a magnificent view of the sound—the Olympics, white all the year—the rocky and encircling shores and wooded hills. It is already becoming a fashionable resort. The traveling public are attracted by this unique and desirable residence.

I was pleased above all things amidst the adornments of this popular hotel to see a noble and expressiv picture of Robert G. Ingersoll—one of the best I hav ever looked upon. The colonel stands out vigorously, nearly full length, as if in the flood-tide of his magnificent oratory. It is a glorious picture, and Hotel Dallas with its lovely surroundings makes a fit framework. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Reflections from San Francisco.

Over on the south side of Market street there dwells a solemn sort of an individual who occupies most of his time in estimating profit and loss in real estate transactions, and who, consequently, possesses no great degree of sensitivness in the conscientious region of his anatomy. But, despite his bold plunges in the transfer of titles to the inheritance of man, he is possessed of an alarming timidity in regard to the future life. The traits developed prominently by his profession again come uppermost and he makes an effort to cover his future risks in a manner certainly creditable upon the score of unusualness. It seems that at a period dating some two or three decades back, and in obedience to the laws of nature and the customs of society, there appeared upon this sublunar stage of action a diminutiv youth, and the destinies which mold the extremities of man decreed that as his years increased his resources should decrease, until he became so poverty-stricken as to put under his feet all pride, so far as employment or employer was concerned, and that he should then, being in a strictly proper condition of humility, go to work in the vineyard of the Lord, or, in other words, join the Salvation Army.

This, of course, was not a cash transaction. Nor was there any specific agreement as to a time limit, the young man expressing himself as satisfied with credit upon the records kept by a sentinel reputed to be of ethereal composition and possessing unvarying accuracy as a bookkeeper. The exigencies of this mundane sphere compelled the young man to rustle about for at least a limited amount of golden coin and for a long time he had a hard struggle to maintain the combination of force and matter necessary to an individualized existence.

But fortune came rapping at his door one day and he happened to be "at home." Wandering about in search of souls to save he ran across the man of real estate transactions and soon consummated a bargain. Now if the pangs of hunger afflict the vitals of this ardent Salvationist he straightway hies away to the residence or the office of his new friends, prays for him, and receives therefor a liberal compensation in the legal coin of the realm. This is an actual unornamented fact without varnish.

From the south of Market street I will take my reader to the extreme northern limit of the city, where the sand runs down under the water which dashes in at the Golden Gate and plays unceasing music upon the rocky islets bordering the channel through which French frigates, American men-of-war, mercantil vessels, pleasure steamers, and Chinese emigrants find their way into the great harbor.

Just where the glittering beams coming through the ocean gateway from the setting sun rest upon the sandy shore, there stands an old structure locally known as "the cobweb house"—so called because spiders and dust hav had undisputed possession of its exterior for twenty years or more, and its walls are festooned with filmy lacework eclipsing any effort of skilled human fingers with needle. An old captain, grown gray in the service of the sea, occupies this quaint and dilapidated dwelling and dispenses libelous liquor from grimy glasses to the incongruity which seeks material spirits. I could not help noticing as I surveyed the premises one of the absurd contradictions which nature is continually presenting. This silver-haired veteran of the deep maintained his life by means of the vile stuff which he dispensed. His partners in the transaction invited destruction by the same means. The dingy redwood table over which the glasses passed stood as a dividing line between life and death.

The dusty wooden walls of this curious place are adorned with numerous pictures more or less classic and more or less valuable—generally less valuable and more classic than popular Eastern tastes would approve of. In the corners, overhead, upon the floor, and about the yard, are all sorts of marine and terrestrial curiosities which, gathered as they are from all sections of the globe, would form subjects for hours of entertaining study, and amid a motley mass of animate and inanimate matter the old man is drifting down the channel of life and will soon sail out upon the unknown ocean of eternity.

It was the intelligence of the animate life about the old place that particularly charmed me. The birds and animals seemed full of it. To be sure, their vocabulary was limited and much of their language that of gesture, yet they used this with such appropriateness and made their desires so plainly manifest that I fell to wondering if after all man had moved very far on the scale of progression.

Fear, hate, envy, rage, cunning, supplication, delight, desire, affection—these and other sentiments were made as plainly manifest as man could make them, and as I watched the birds, the dogs, the monkeys, and even the small-brained kangaroo, I could not avoid noticing that their education and development was in a general sense similar to that of the animal called man. The process is the same. A series of impressions made upon the brain by environments educates both. The brain of the man is perhaps of finer texture; it is larger, and more complex. It retains a greater number of impressions and can compare data and arrive at probable results further removed. But otherwise there is no difference unless it be in favor of the animal.

But the fading light warned me that I had little time to waste over the complications of this problem and so I took my departure, a great green parrot hanging by its feet in the doorway, which had started this train of reflections by the clearly enunciated greeting, "How-de-do," remarking gravely as I passed out, "How-de-do." The words interrupted the continuity of my theorizing and I fell to thinking what far-reaching effect little things sometimes hav. "How-de-do," said the parrot. F. L. BROWNE.

The Romantic History of Liberal, Mo.

Since all science comes from accurate observation, experiments, and experience, biography and history are necessary to a happy, successful life. To do the little I can in this good work I write under the above head. Fifteen years ago it was my fortune to make the acquaintance of G. H. Walser in Lamar, Mo. Having earned a surplus of means at the bar and in real estate, read and thought himself out of the God idea and the many obscene absurdities of the Bible, and desiring to improve the lives of the people about him, he was organizing an association he named the Sacred Brotherhood. It was my pleasure to attend his first meeting and to observe the forming of other like societies afterward in that region of Missouri. Finally the Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis railroad was chartered and commenced work. The keen brain of Walser spied the chance of an increased fortune for himself and a colony for Freethinkers. Happening again in Lamar and enjoying the hospitality of himself and good wife, I rode out with him fifteen miles west, viewing together the nice undulating land through which railroad stakes were set. It was soon purchased, some of it laid off in lots, immigrants came in, and the colony started with bright prospects. In a few years it was my pleasure to make them a visit. A nice common hall was up and well attended, Sundays spent in one or two lectures and a school for all classes to learn and teach practical science. A common Liberal, social spirit and happy neighborship pervaded the settlers and welcomed every new immigrant. Here did it seem that life was indeed worth living. Some Methodist people with a zeal not according to knowledge procured a lot and built a house for worship. Wishing to fairly discuss their tenants Mr. Walser and a few other Liberals went to one of their meetings and proposed a discussion as it was closing. This being discourteously rejected, Mr. Walser rose to announce a lecture and was ordered down. Not obeying, a squabble ensued, which ended in much strife, a lawsuit, and a Methodist secession to build up an adjoining village. Still, if possible, more unfortunate than this religious trouble, there began to brew a divide in the Freethinking citizens. The element of so-called free love crept in, and failing to discriminate between love and lust, misunderstandings, and even persecutions for opinion's sake, like a black frost in August nipped the flower in the social circle. One of their best business citizens, the reliable station agent, and his family, were involved, and, considering discretion the better part of valor, sold out and went East. It is self-evident that all genuin thought and love per se must be free. They can neither be bought, sold, nor shackled, efforts and pretenses to the contrary notwithstanding. To think and speak evil of one for so believing is religious persecution. Disagreeing on subjects of minor importance and magnifying them too much, the colonists began to divide seriously, nor did the paper started by Mr. Walser and edited by one after another of less caliber, tend to unite. Clairvoyance, Spiritualism, and Christian Science came in succession, intermixed with the lingering life of the Sacred Brotherhood, good in itself when well administered. Finally one Dr. Bouton among them began to investigate Spiritualism, professed to see something real in it, learned readily to make raps and move tables, and step after step became a successful medium in slate-writing, materializing, etc. While the more solid citizens had faith only in the manufacturing of all this by the doctor and two or three aiders and abettors, the larger and constantly increasing part of the people were enthusiastic in accepting, defending, and enjoying these manifestations of returning spirits. To confirm the faith the following certificate came out:

We, the undersigned citizens of Liberal, Barton county, Mo., hav a personal acquaintance with Dr. J. B. Bouton, and know him to be a man of truth and a worthy citizen.

We hav been given the privilege of examining the conditions under which certain slate-writings take place in said Dr. Bouton's house, alleged to be through the instrumentality of spirits. We hav availed ourselvs of said privilege, and hav made a thorough examination of said premises, and we hereby pronounce it utterly impossible that said writing can occur through visible or tangible human agency.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, a notary public in and for the county of Barton, state of Missouri, this the fifth day of June, 1885. F. L. YALE, Notary Public.

It is but fair to believe that the motivs bringing out this certificate were philanthropic. In accord with the common saying, the hearts of the certifiers were right enough but their heads wrong enough. And yet the certificate solemnized by the sacred oath administered by a civil, though not an ecclesiastical, officer, had its effect in spreading the ism and increasing the excitement. Having an acquaintance with Mr. Yale as a solid Materialist I can certify, though not on oath, that he did not present the Bible to the lips of a single one of the five swearers. As religionists are apt to say that cleanliness is next to godliness, were it not well for them to pray and plead that the Bible kept for swearing should be cleansed inside and out, that the kisser of it might likewise be clean?

Being honored on another visit with a special invitation to attend a slate-writing séance given by Dr. B., three messages came down from the top of his closet, and the Spiritual friends insisted that I must thereby be convinced. Asking if each were not in the peculiar handwriting of the party when in the flesh, getting an affirmativ answer, I suggested the propriety of getting an adept in chirography to trace the attempted disguise to one and the same fingers still in the flesh. Next I said the only way to write on the slate was to move the softer pencil on the slate's surface to leave its particles of a different color. As this is commonly done with the fingers, I knew of no spirits with fingers, and matter being impenetrable, it seemed impossible for fingers to pass through the solid wall of the closet. It was admitted by the medium that the pencil was essential to the writing, since it must go up and come down with the slate. Then how could the writing be accounted for? I said a living incarnate spirit might be between the roof and the closet's top, slide a board, and pass the slate and its messages. This was positivly rejected, since it was an impeachment of the doctor's integrity and besides a committee had examined and certified to the impossibility of fraud. My reply was that the doctor's integrity was not on trial, and if genuin could take care of itself, but it could harm no one to hav a second search after a message-manufacturing contrivance. All this being ignored, I went my way to Florida and in due time I received a letter from a doubting Thomas that flames had got into the roof above the closet, men had rushed up with their axes, cut away the burning shingles and down to the messengerizing, if not the materializing, slates. At this the doctor, sitting in his yard, turned heartsick, and has had since to endure frowns reversing in "double quick" the smiles of the spirits. Much has the unfortunate doctor needed the intercession of the denizens of the skies to comfort him with the hope, yea, the certainty of a higher life, exempt from his misadventures in this. But he has issued a creditable pamphlet detailing the adventure from its beginning to its end which will be sent to anyone for three stamps. The valuable space of THE TRUTH SEEKER allows no more than a brief close to this writing.

First: Strange that persons thus delivered from their delusions should follow the same dismal line of fraud and deceit. But few seem as yet to take Ingersoll's advice: "One world at a time." Indeed, some still maintain that the doctor was and is yet a medium.

Second: How can ordinary intelligence fail to perceive, in accord with General Jackson's maxim that "the world is governed too much," and yet more surely, the world believes too much? Absurd as Spiritualists see the Bible to be and its endless superstitions afflicting humanity, how can they fail to see the follies, frauds, and absurdities of their ism? Finally, may the aged friend and well-wisher of all suggest the wisdom of first proving all things, that we may next hold fast to that which is good. Considering the multitudes of conflicting opinions and faiths, can we cherish the egotism that we are wholly exempt from them? That we know it all; that we are right, and others, calling for proof, wrong? Must we ignore the history of science evincing that it is conceived in doubts, and grows to its giant proportions by demonstrations? Can there be any wrong in saying of some wild notions, We don't know—holding and living on the actual good we do know, learning diligently, humbly, and patiently all the more practical good pertaining to this life as we liv it? Is it not the wiser and happier way to liv a good life to insure a good death? Opinions are worthless, often injurious, unless based upon sound evidence and truth after a careful, patient investigation of the subject.

I am constrained to remind every intelligent reader that ignoring the power of the press is to liv in helpless imbecility. The history of the slave-holding states before the war supplementing the horrors of preceding religious persecutions, is a standing dismal monument of this sad fact. A Congressman from that region once boasted in open debate that there was not a newspaper published in his district. The Union was dismembered, the Confederacy organized, a million citizens slaughtered, and billions wasted to rivet the chains of slavery, resulting in shattering the last link and the cause wretchedly lost. A little common sense disseminated by the press had saved all this misery. Five or six cents per week from each one will maintain our Freethought journals, the rights of humanity, and the honor of our race. W. PERKINS.

Worth Considering.

The English language is spreading so rapidly over the earth, it is to be deprecated that its orthography is left so difficult, uncouth, and inconsistent. It is estimated that in ten years it will be spoken by seven hundred million people, while only five hundred million will be speaking other European tongues. As, therefore, English will be indisputably the language of the future, it behooves every intelligent person speaking it to do all that can be done to facilitate its written representation by making its orthography easy, economical, and reasonable.

We are slowly simplifying its syntax and orthography; but it is singular that though these changes are universally approved when once established, they are opposed by most of our popular writers while being made. It is only the few determined, aggressiv, plucky men who should be credited with these improvements, and yet it is only these who are laughed at and ridiculed, while the masses are gradually molded to adopt the "innovations."

Changes in our language and its orthography are so slow we do not see their progress while they are being established, but by comparing the present with the past they are very apparent. For instance, take the following, transcribed from an English tombstone, and which, from collateral proof, evidently represents the English of its time:

"Man com & se how schal alle dede be; wen yow comes bad & bare; noth hav ven we aware fare, all ys weriness yt for care."

How changed and beautiful this would appear dressed in the present garb of our language: "Man, come and see how you will be when dead; so bare and drear, not aware how you fare when free from weariness and care."—Items of Interest.

Lectures and Meetings.

S. P. PUTNAM'S lecture appointments for October are as follows: San Francisco, October 11th; Sacramento, 18th. Will lecture in California through the months of October, November, December, and January, state convention January 29th.

J. G. HERTWIG, P. O. box 413, Washington, D. C., intends to lecture during the forthcoming fall and winter on the following subjects: 1. "National Taxation," opposing the present customs and internal revenue systems of the United States and advocating a not graduated income tax in their stead, for raising the revenue necessary for the support of the government. 2. "Free Coinage," advocating free and unlimited coinage, from American silver, of a temporary silver dollar, correct as to its bullion value, and, as soon as it can be accomplished, an international agreement as to fixed ratio between gold and silver as monetary metals. 3. "Sunday Laws," energetically opposing such laws, as violating the Constitution of the United States, and, in addition, expounding the other demands of Liberalism. He urgently and sincerely solicits engagements for these lectures.

NOTHING is more simple and natural, in the early stages of civilization, than belief in occult, self-conscious powers of evil. Troubles and calamities come upon man; his ignorance of physical laws forbids him to attribute them to physical causes; he therefore attributes them sometimes to the wrath of a good being, but more frequently to the malice of an evil being. Especially is this the case with diseases. The real causes of disease are so intricate that they are reached only after ages of scientific labor; hence they, above all, hav been attributed to the influence of evil spirits.—Ex-President White of Cornell University.

THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION—WORK THAT ALL CAN DO.

On the first of last November I wrote E. P. Ferry, the governor of the state, respectfully requesting that in his Thanksgiving proclamation he would not giv recognition to any religion, or make request that the people on that day assemble at their places of worship, or recommend the spending of the day, or any part thereof, in acts of worship. My protest was declared to be too late, the proclamation had been drafted.

This year I propose to make sure of being ahead of time.

I hav written to the various vice-presidents throughout the state, but there are many who will not thus be reached. I ask every member of the Washington Secular Union and every L beral and intelligent voter in the state of Washington to write a letter to the governor of the state, calling his attention to the matter.

Reader, you say: "Oh! if I was only able I would be so glad to help the cause." Well, here is your chance. It will take only one hour's time and cost only a two-cent stamp. Two thousand such letters should be sent to the governor between now and the time of issuing his proclamation.

When a politician receives large numbers of personal letters from voters, he is quick to comply with their request, fearing they might use influence against him at next election.

Every Liberal who neglects to write to the governor of the state on the subject, fails in duty alike to his avowed principles and his fellow-Infidels The receipt of vast numbers of letters will not alone influence the action of the governor in this matter, but convince the powers that be that the Infidels hold the balance of power at our next election, and this will insure our claims receiving respectful attention from politicians of both parties.

Liberals claim their desire is to learn "what is duty and to do it." Let us act up to our profession. Time will not wait our leisure; soon it will be too late. Write at once, to-day, this mail!

For the benefit of Liberal friends who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav prepared the following copy of a letter to the governor. If your friend cannot be persuaded to write a personal letter, cut this letter from your paper and let him paste it on a clean sheet of writing-paper, head it with his address and sign it with his full name.

FORM OF LETTER TO THE GOVERNOR.

This form is only suggestiv; or for the use of those who cannot be induced to write for themselvs. But better send copy of this or even cut it out and paste on sheet of letter-paper and sign with full name, than not write at all.

———, WASH., Sept. —, 1891.

TO THE HON. E. P. FERRY, Governor State of Washington, Olympia, Wash., Dear Sir: As the time is approaching for issuing the annual Thanksgiving proclamation I respectfully call your attention to the fact that our government is civil, not ecclesiastical; has no religion, and therefore no authority to issue proclamations calling on citizens to acknowledge any particular God, or to observe any stated time for prayers, fasts, feasts, or worship.

I do not object to the chief executiv appointing legal holidays in which no citizen can be compelled to transact ordinary business, but I do most earnestly and emphatically protest against the governor or any other servant of the people dictating, advising, or requesting the people on any such legal holiday to assemble for worship or in any way indicate how the hours of such holiday shall be spent.

Our state constitution guarantees "absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment." A proclamation by the chief executiv dictates and influences religious sentiment, and is, therefore, a violation of the spirit of our bill of rights.

I hav failed, after a careful reading of our state constitution, to find any clause authorizing or instructing the governor to issue proclamation for thanksgiving or any other religious feast, fast, or holy day.

It is claimed, "Thanksgiving proclamations do not decree any religious observance but only recommend a day of general thanksgiving. such recommendation having no binding force or influence."

Then they should most certainly be dispensed with, since they disturb, irritate, and outrage the sentiments of a very large number of good and worthy citizens.

But since they do hav force and influence, I ask you why one class of citizens should be favored above others, and their religious fancies pandered to by the government of the state, and the belief and sentiments of thousands of other equally good and worthy citizens be insulted or ignored.

If any citizen has especial cause for gratitude to his God it is an insult to the intelligence of such citizen for any government official (servant of the people) to issue instructions as to when and to which of the "supreme rulers" the citizen shall say, "Thank you."

Jefferson said: "The government has no right to indirectly assume an authority over religious exercises which the Constitution has directly precluded it from."

Madison declared: "The broadest principles of the Constitution would entirely preclude the chief executiv from thus interfering with the religious affairs of the nation."

Grant said: "Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school supported by private contribution, but keep the state and church forever separate."

No possible wrong, loss, or injury can result to any citizen from your careful exclusion from your proclamation of any legal holiday all mention, reference, or allusion to religion or religious observances.

My political action and that of the members of the Washington Secular Union at the next election will be influenced by your decision in this matter.

Confidently relying on your using every endeavor to insure to each and all citizens of the state "absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship,"

Yours respectfully, ——— ———.

A SHORTER FORM FOR THE VERY BUSY.

———, WASH., Sept. —, 1891.

TO THE HON E. P. FERRY, Olympia, Wash., Dear Sir: Our state constitution does not instruct the governor to issue proclamations with recommendation to the people to assemble for worship; or with exhortations to giv thanks to God.

Jefferson, Madison, Grant, denounce such acts.

I respectfully request you to abstain from any such recommendation in your next annual Thanksgiving proclamations.

No possible loss or injury can result to any person from your so abstaining.

My vote and influence will be biased by your action in this matter. Yours truly, ——— ———.

Liberal: Now, please do not neglect this with the excuse, "Lots of others will attend to this without me." You hav a duty to do, and by your love of justice, right, and liberty I beseech you to promptly perform it.

Union of church and state is not a small matter, and remember the gaining this point will greatly help us in securing other rights.

All depends on each and all doing their individual duty. Write, and urge others to write. Do it at once. C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. Wash. Sec. Union.

Christians Cannot Tolerate the Practice of Bible Examples and Precepts.

A DOSE OF THEIR OWN MEDICIN NAUSEATES THEIR STOMACHS. TO PROFESS A BELIEF IN CHRISTIANITY AND THE BIBLE IS ADMISSIBLE; TO PRACTICE IT IS INSUFFERABLE. A CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY BROUGHT FACE TO FACE WITH THE PRACTICAL WORKING OF ITS OWN SYSTEM, AND BITTERLY OPPOSING IT. WHAT IS WRONG IN PRACTICE CANNOT BE RIGHT IN THEORY. WHY CANNOT MEN AND WOMEN OF ORDINARY SENSE SEE IT?

The people of this town are both devout and sanctimonious. A branch of the N. G. A. College is located here, and the students are compelled to observe those religious forms so distasteful to all young people of sense and refinement. It so happened that an Infidel from the neighboring state of Tennessee sojourned here during the past summer, and from time to time essayed to giv free Liberal lectures at the court house. These lectures, which were given Sunday afternoons, were well attended by the students, many of whom had never heard that there were two sides to the orthodox question. They became much interested in the speaker's radical views, and demanded of the resident clergymen that they meet and refute them. This, for obvious reasons, the clergy refused to do, and many of the students became indoctrinated with heterodox opinions. To hav a godless Infidel come into a stronghold of orthodoxy and proselyte the college students to the teaching of modern Infidelity, was too exasperating to be meekly endured by the faithful, and threats and mutterings of smothered rage could be heard by the listening ear. The more passiv-natured saints in secret prayer implored God to convert this horrid perverter of souls or compel him to hastily emigrate to a climate that was lurid in appearance and torrid in temperature. That the speaker was most provoking, I do not deny. He boldly declared that the combined influence of the Bible and church was, and ever had been, fearfully deleterious to the morals of society. He denounced the doctrin of the "innate depravity" of man as a vile heresy against the race, and that of the "atonement" as an unqualified license to the commission of crime. The only creed which he enunciated was, "Do right, and fear neither man, God, nor the devil."

Now it so happened that about the time that this Infidel closed his redemptiv labors among us an evangelist and his devout young wife made their advent into our town. The name of this man of God was Zachariah, and he, like his namesake of old, was a devout man and filled with the Holy Ghost. His coming seemed opportune and the Christians of Dahlonega received him and his devoted wife with warm hearts and open arms. This evangelist was one of Prince Immanuel's true and tried veterans. For many long years, under the influence of the Holy Ghost and by the authority of the Methodist Episcopal church, he had perambulated the byways of North Carolina, and many were the obdurate "tar-heels" that he plucked as burning brands from the flames of eternal and unquenchable fire. The faithful brethren and sisters here at once joined him in inaugurating an extensiv campaign against the world, the flesh, and the devil. A series of meetings were held not only in the town but in the adjacent rural districts, and many and powerful were the sermons preached by this newly-arrived advocate of Jesus and his all-atoning blood. While the theological goose thus hung high and many encomiums were being lavished on Brother Bell by his ardent admirers, an ugly report came floating along on a passing breeze to the effect that several months previous this devout man of God had secured all the household funds and then eloped with a young woman of his flock, who was one of his ardent admirers and was passionately fond of the Holy Ghost business, leaving behind him a wife and five children in destitute circumstances. No sooner was this report confirmed than the brethren here arrested Brother Bell and his sprightly young Hagar, and incarcerated them in the county jail; whereupon the above-referred-to Infidel wrote to one of the brethren here the following significant letter:

"No. 14 S. FIFTH ST. PHILADELPHIA, PA.,
"Sept. 18 1891.

"MR. ———, Dear Sir: I hav just learned that you and other Christian brethren of Dahlonega hav caussd the evangelist, Zachariah Bell, and his young wife, to be arrested and incarcerated in the county jail. Now, considering the zealous work your brother did in your midst for the cause of Christ, and the many sinners whom he awakened to a sense of their lost condition, you acted not only unjustly toward your brother but inconsistently with your profession. You should hav remembered that your brother in taking to himself an extra wife only imitated, in a feeble way, his illustrious exemplars, 'faithful Abraham,' 'good old Isaac,' Judah, David, and Solomon, all of whom were distinguished Bible heroes and special favorits of the God you worship. These illustrious Bible champions each had all the way from six to one thousand wives and concubines, and instead of condemning them, you commend them to your Sunday-school children as exemplars of righteousness. In the face of these facts how could you be so cruel to Brother Bell, who only took to himself one single extra wife? You certainly should hav, under the circumstances, commended him for his moderation in the Abraham and Hagar business. I would further call your attention to the fact that polygamy was approved and practiced in Judea in the time of Christ, and yet he never uttered a single word in condemnation of it. Your God 'gave to the bosom of David all the wives of his master Saul,' thereby placing the seal of his perpetual approval on the plural wife system (see 2 Sam. xii). But you may urge that your brother deserted his first wife and children. I would remind you that his authority for doing so as a Christian you cannot gainsay. You hav complimented Brother Bell for his devotion and fidelity to the cause of Christ. Just here allow me to remind you that Christ repeatedly enjoined upon his followers that they must 'forsake wife and children and follow him.' In Matt. xix and Mark x he actually offers eternal life as a premium to those who would forsake their wives and children for his and the 'gospel's sake.' And yet, when Brother Bell sets about reducing these examples and precepts of your Bible and your Jesus to practice, you arrest and put him in jail. If your profession cannot be reduced to practice without danger of arrest and imprisonment, my advice is for you to abandon it and substitute something better in its stead. From an Infidel's standpoint we admit that it looked unjust and cruel for your brother in Christ to rob and abandon his wife and children; but it was not half so bad as 'faithful Abraham' banishing his young wife Hagar and her little child to the wilderness of Beersheba, to encounter its manifold dangers without protection. If the Rev. Mr. Bell deserves a coat of tar and feathers with which you threaten him, then should old Abraham hav been constituted the chief man in an impromptu necktie party, as a just punishment for his unfeeling brutality to his young wife and innocent child. Of course we confess that from an Infidel standard of morals the conduct of your brother was outrageously unjust and wrong; but according to the Bible and commands of Christ it was strictly consistent and right. We honestly advise you and all other good-meaning Christians to discard the Bible from your homes and substitute n its stead Combe's 'Constitution of Man.' Let he Lord run his own business, and giv to poor, half-bred, diseased, ignorant humanity the attention to which its deplorable condition so strongly entitles it. In my reform labors among you last summer I tried to impress upon you a sense of the pernicious influence of your iniquitous old system of superstition, and the recent episode in which your brother in Christ and his consistent wife No. 2 constitute the chief actors should be conclusiv proof to you of the correctness of my position. We admonish you and your Christian brothers and sisters at Dahlonega to learn a lesson from recent experience, and at once and forever abandon the theory of religion that can not be reduced to practice without shocking your moral natures and sense of decency. Hoping you may receive this admonitory letter in the same spirit of kindness in which it is written, I remain, with many kind wishes for your welfare and happiness,

"WARREN SMITH.

"Dahlonega, Ga., Sept. 20, 1891."

In our opinion it would be a good idea to constitute these ever-recurring episodes of Christian immoralities as a text from which to preach to the faithful an efficient Secular sermon. Let us call things by their proper names, and do all we can to expose the deformities of the Christian superstition in a manner to arrest the attention of its deluded devotees. Woman's shoulders support the church. Let us strive to break the priestly spell resting on these modern Titanias, and convince them that they hav been wooing and caressing something far more unsightly and loathsome than a Shaksperean donkey.

Letters on English Secularism.

If ever English Secularism passed through a severe ordeal, it is passing through one at the present time. Disaster after disaster hav come and left their clammy finger-marks upon the victim; yet Secularism rises triumphantly after each assault and bids fair to lead the way in no very distant future.

Years ago, when Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant stood shoulder to shoulder in defense of the right of publication, only one side of the Secularist teaching was affected. Fortunately the damage done to the cause was equal to the benefits it received; from that time to this, vicious Christians hav maintained that Secularism is a means of spreading immoral knowledge, because the two co-defendants were leaders in the National Secular Society. When Mr. Foote and his colleagues in business were committed to prison for publishing the Freethinker, it was but a side issue, comparativly speaking, though one of utmost importance in itself. When Mr. Bradlaugh made his gallant stand against an iniquitous House of Commons, notwithstanding the vitality of the question as to whether men who disbelieve in a God should be made to swear by one, he was but fighting a battle which could not seriously interfere with the growth of Freethought in England. Now the circumstances are changed. It is no longer side issues that are at stake. The whole religious world has set itself to break up our Freethought party and exterminate its teachings.

Mrs. Besant's defection is known to all. That gifted lady has been caught in Theosophic nets and would fain hav all of us be entrapped, too. With a solid unanimity the party has said, "No, thank you." Mrs. Besant is evidently disappointed and disgusted. Having changed her front she now sees nothing of our old successes. Bitter indeed are the passages of arms which now and again take place between her and our trusted leader, G. W. Foote. No one who was present at the densely crowded meeting at the Hall of Science when Mrs. Besant took her inglorious "farewell," as she termed it, will forget the subdued expression of pain as those who had so often lingered on her words heard her declare in favor of the truth of the letters from an unseen world.

All felt for her and pitied her in her weakness; but all felt, too, that she must be allowed to go her own way. Powerful, indeed, was her lecture; her face plainly showing the state of emotion into which she had worked herself. Always clear in what she had to say, she seemed especially clear on that long-to-be-remembered evening. At the close of the address, without even sitting down, Mrs. Besant with her constant companion, Mr. Herbert Burrows, Miss Besant, and Mrs. Thornton Smith, who presided, abruptly turned to the left, descended the platform, and passed out, to the bewilderment of the audience. Never before had such tactics been displayed at the Hall of Science. According to notification and the invariable rule at Freethought meetings, discussion was invited; but with the chairman and lecturer gone, how could people discuss Theosophy? Mr. Forder, the secretary of the National Secular Society, and Mr. Touzeau Parris, a Hall of Science lecturer, did speak, but the interest of the meeting was gone. Mrs. Bonner, Mr. Bradlaugh's married daughter, sat almost unnoticed in the audience.

A fortnight later (September 13th) Mr. G. W. Foote drew a crowded audience to hear him discourse on "What Does Mrs. Besant Mean?" Clear as a bell his voice rang through the hall, as step by step he pulled Mrs. Besant's statements to shreds. What he had to say about Theosophy matters but little; but what he had to say about the decline of Atheism and other unfriendly allusions made by Mrs. Besant was eagerly caught up and vociferously cheered by the immense assembly. No one could doubt that Mrs. Besant fully intends the disruption of the Freethought party, if it can be accomplished. The Daily Chronicle, a third-rate London daily, has been lavish in its supply of Theosophic information, letters on Mahatmas, verbatim reports of Mrs. Besant's speeches and so on; but there was never a line upon Mr. Foote's crushing rejoinder. It is one thing to advocate and quite another to repudiate Secularism.

And so the battle remains at present. Would that it were ended! Trumpery bigots hav caught the disease. Following our late vice-president, they poohpooh the advance of Secularism and quote Mrs. Besant like the gospel. This very week come two reports from branches in the suburbs, at one of which an effort is being made to eject our lecturers from the common land on which they hav spoken for years past; the other declares that the bands of the Salvation Army and Church Army hav conspired to play down the speakers' voices; as they can not talk them out of the place they will try what a liberal dose of trumpet and drum will do for them.

In yet another it is unsafe to giv lectures because the Christian spies jot down the names of listeners and duly report their misbehavior to their employers, who in their turn scarcely dare to refuse dismissal of men they would prefer to keep in their employ. Such cases of prompt dismissal occur not only in small outlying villages, but even in cities like Manchester. But the Freethought party is gaining strength every day; and under Mr. Foote's judicious management the National Secular Society seems bound to conquer.

Among the more serious drawbacks to the work is a split over the Memorial Hall. There hav always been admirers of Charles Bradlaugh who would hav nothing whatever to do with his Secularism. These people had to be taken into consideration. Now, the English law does not permit Atheists to hold property in trust, as do all sorts of Christians. No agreement is binding; no legacies may be bequeathed to us, and no corporate property can be held by us, and so, when the National Secular Society wished to raise a suitable memorial hall to our late revered president, it became necessary to form a commercial company to run the hall. Of course everyone understood the idea; but as Christian tactics are not necessarily just and honorable we had to guard against them as much as possible. The National Secular Society people subscribed by far the largest part of the money yet raised, and suggested buying up the old Hall of Science, the scene of so many of Bradlaugh's triumphs, and where dear old D. M. Bennett, as in the case of many another notable Freethinker, was banqueted and otherwise honored, with a view to rebuilding it as money might flow in. Our enemies hav opposed the plan, and by packed meetings temporarily overthrown it. The result will be a new rift in the party on the one hand, and a consolidation of out and out Secularists on the other. You can no more separate Bradlaugh from the National Secular Society than you can separate him from the parentage of his own children; and no monument, by whomsoever raised, can be more expressiv of his life and work than that of the National Secular Society, for which it might almost be said he lived and died.

If the Editor allows me, I hope to giv American Freethinkers an accurate insight into English Secularism, dealing with the more serious events as they happen, and using quieter weeks to explain our system, work and workers. SAMUEL STANDRING.

Jehovah.

Who was that mighty one of old
Whose favors could be bought or sold,
Whose aid was paid in blood or gold?
Jehovah.

Who waked from his eternal calm
To make the pigeon and the lamb
And angels too to sing a psalm?
Jehovah.

Who formed the earth before the sun
And saw 'twas good when he was done,
Then made the devil just for fun?
Jehovah.

Who made the snake more wise than Eve
And gave it power to deceive,
Then damned all those who don't believe?
Jehovah.

Who planned the serpent and the fall,
The Virgin, Balaam's ass, and all,
And on the cross so loud did bawl?
Jehovah.

Who tailor-like did sew some skins
To cover Adam's dirty shins,
Then died to save him from his sins?
Jehovah.

Whose warlike deeds were always sealed
With victory on battle-field,
Till iron cars made him to yield?
Jehovah.

Who was it that the sun did stay
And lengthen out a summer day,
To giv his servants time to slay?
Jehovah.

Who left his shining worlds on high,
Was born a babe, did whine and cry
As he on woman's lap did lie?
Jehovah.

Who joyful news came here to tell:
Believe and pay my priests right well,
Or I will burn you all in hell?
Jehovah.

The devil took his maker up
And flew away to mountain top—
If he had only let him drop,
Jehovah!

Who then to show his power divine,
Like other frauds did make bad wine,
And drown the devils in the swine?
Jehovah.

Who on the back of asses two
The city gates rode proudly through,
Then stuck a fellow's ear with glue?
Jehovah.

Who like weak man did pray and cry
When hung upon the cross so high,
And strange to tell did really die?
Jehovah.

The dying thief he did deceive,
He kindly told him not to grieve,
For they would meet that very eve,
Jehovah.

Then down to hell he took his way—
Lamentable he did not stay
Instead of rising the third day,
Jehovah.

Wanted—A Spirit.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER FRIENDS: I promised to tell you the result of my search for spirit manifestations in New York, Brooklyn, and Williamsburg, but really I found nothing worth lumbering up the paper with. I got slate-writing it is true, but only under the table, and a few words at a time, and written only as the medium herself might hav done it, so it was not at all satisfactory. I got nothing that hit nearer than a fortune-teller might hit—three prophecies that may yet be fulfilled, though I doubt it. I did not see the big gun of all, Keeler, as he was not in Williamsburg yet.

Friends told me marvels and showed me autographs and portraits innumerable said to hav been produced under absolute test conditions. I think probably the phenomena are much of them real. But what produces it I know not. I do not think the dead hav anything to do with it, but that it is some not understood power or faculty in the living. It is truly interesting and wonderful, and I should hav liked to hav followed it up further had I had time and means.

I hav had three months of visiting and enjoyed every hour of it, and laid in a store of pleasant memories for the future. Everyone has been so kind and good to me that I felt as if human nature had suddenly become more affectional, generous, and good than it ever was before.

I hav seen so much in botanical gardens, hothouses, museums, and other interesting and instructiv places that I feel as if years had been added to my life—pleasant, agreeable, happy years, too. I wish each and all of you may some time hav as pleasant and enjoyable a three months as I hav had. Home is pleasant after my long absence and I am enjoying it to the full. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Snowville, Va., Sept. 19, 291.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.
2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.
3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.
4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.
5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.
6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts and when convenient hand one to a friend.
7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

WE will furnish free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. A Freethinker of good address, man or woman, out of work, could make good salary selling this book in any town of fairly Liberal inhabitants.

We hope that whenever a Freethinker sees an article in his local paper in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays he will mark it and send a copy to Benjamin Butterworth, secretary Board of Directors of World's Fair, Rand-McNally building, Chicago, Ill., and to John T. Dickinson, secretary National Commission of World's Fair, at the same address. Let us make a vigorous and persistent fight in this matter. Our efforts must not slacken till the final decision is made, which may not be till 1893.

THE Bible Picture Book, we take pleasure in saying, is now under way, and will be issued as soon this fall as the work can be done and done well. The price will be $1, and it will contain a great deal for that amount. In renewing for THE TRUTH SEEKER we hope our readers will not forget to inclose the dollar for it.

HEARTY and well-deserved thanks are returned to the following for their efforts in sending us new subscribers:

W. J. Locke, S. P. Putnam, B. F. Harrington, L. N. Anderson, J. T. Murray, N. H. Cone, W. L. Ryder, H. Welisch, E. E. Matteson, Mrs. T. S. Olds, R. Lechner, T. G. Redfield, R. Pfaendter, F. C. Scharnhart, C. P. Farrell, J. V. Harbison, D. M. Angus, C. Dansby, H. L. Lindeleaf, John Downes, P. F. Spencer, A. Wilson. David West, Mrs. P. Gulick, R. J. Wilson, Mel Pierce, G. E. Gandelot, D. Walsh, W. Dennison, Fred Busch, F. C. Wright, L. K. Smith.

We also acknowledge a generous and needed donation to our fund for distributing Liberal literature from Captain Silas Latham, of Noank, Conn., of five dollars. We shall use it to send documents to the World's Fair authorities.

The Decision of the Washington Attorney-General.

The decision printed in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER relativ to reading the Bible in the public schools of the state of Washington has resulted from the earnest efforts and persistent presentation of the constitutional facts and arguments by the Washington Secular Union to the county superintendents and school boards throughout the state, and to their consequent requests to the state superintendent to decide the question. The nub of the decision is, No Bible-reading, prayers, or any religious worship in any public school in the state of Washington. It is good, it is great; the Infidels of Washington are to be congratulated, and also commended.

The attorney-general, however, is weak on one point—about "sacred" songs. If any religious songs are sung, as Mr. Jones intimates there may be, teachers will soon select their own sectarian hymns, and their particular religious belief thus be impressed upon the pupils. The example of Girard College, where the teaching of religion was intended to be prohibited, but where the song manual is fairly scarlet with sectarian teaching, should be kept in mind by Washington Freethinkers, and such attempts to evade constitutional inhibition thwarted.

Mr. C. B. Reynolds voices the natural exultation on the part of the Liberals of his state over the victory on the school question, and in a communication printed in this issue urges the Liberals to settle another matter—that of Thanksgiving proclamations. His plan of campaign is for every Liberal to write a letter to the governor—Hon. E. P. Ferry, Olympia—in regard to his Thanksgiving proclamation, and ask him to refrain from recognition of any religion, or advising that any part of the day be spent in prayer, praise, or any other religious observance. Ten such letters, he thinks, will accomplish more than one thousand names signed to any petition. It will convince him and the politicians of all parties that it is not safe to ignore our just demands; and that it is as necessary to respect organized Liberals as the organized Christians. And if this is done by all the Liberals of Washington, Mr. Reynolds hopes it will exhibit power enough on the part of Liberals to secure the repeal of the law enacted at the last session of the Washington legislature exempting from taxation all church property of a less value than five thousand dollars, a law which slipped through when the officers of the Washington Secular Union were temporarily off guard. "Rejoicing," says Mr. Reynolds, "in the victories won, let us redouble our zeal, and soon every one of the Nine Demands will be allowed in our young giant state of Washington."

What Do Spiritualists Believe?

This is the question our old friend Thomas Goddard asks us to answer; we confess to inability to comply. Like the Methodists the Spiritualists hav not formulated a creed in paragraphs and sections, as hav the Presbyterians and Episcopalians, but depend upon the writings of their leaders and "fathers" for an exegesis of their faith. We hav read a great many Spiritualistic books, but no two writers agree in all particulars. Some of them hav a local heaven, with many "spheres;" others let the spirits wander through the air at will. Some hav animals in their heaven, with flowers, and other good things; they all hav music up there. Some hav people grow; others keep them as they passed away, so we hav old men and babes coming back just of the same age as when they died. Mrs. Luna Hutchinson's "Beyond the Veil" is one of the most poetic descriptions of a Spiritualist's idea of heaven that we hav read, and it is probably as accurate as any. It is as sensual as a Mohammedan heaven, as ideal as Swedenborgianism, as complete in details as John the Revelator's paradise, and is undoubtedly a good description of what a heaven should be to be in keeping with Mrs. Hutchinson's idea.

The philosophy of Spiritualism is yet in a chaotic state. Every Spiritualist who thinks upon the subject thinks different from every other. Like other religions Spiritualism has two wings, the orthodox, or conservativ, wing; and the progressiv, or heretical, wing. Christian Spiritualists, of whom there are many in the East, hav a God. They are Theists, with angelic attachments. The heretical wing are usually Atheists, believe Spiritualism to be capable of scientific demonstration, and are ready to renounce it if it is not. They reason as Materialists, only carrying the potency of matter to a great deal finer point than those who stop at pure material Materialism. Davis's "Harmonial Philosophy" satisfies the first class; the latter class hav no work which general consent accepts as satisfactory. The gist of Spiritualism, and the point upon which they all agree, is that there is another world or life, to which this is a novitiate, and where something emanating from us called a soul, goes after death, and that communion between that world and these souls and this world and living people is possible. They believe that such communication is accomplished through natural laws, imperfectly understood now, but to be in time as well comprehended as the laws of gravitation. In 1872 Robert Dale Owen wrote out the nearest approach to a Spiritualistic creed that we know of, but it was never formally adopted by any body of believers, and would undoubtedly be modified greatly by the majority of the Spiritualists of the United States, as Mr. Owen endeavored to make a religion of Spiritualism as nearly like the Christian theology as he could. The essential points are as follows:

1. The world is governed by a God of love and mercy, in which all things work together for good to those who reverently conform to his eternal laws.

This, it will be observed, is a paraphrase of Rom. viii, 28. Mr. Owen was a Biblical and Christian Spiritualist, which accounts for it. Nowadays, the majority of his faith would say the world is governed by law.

2. There is no death. Life continues from the life which now is into that which is to come.

3. The earth-phase of life is essential as a preparation for the future life.

4. The next life is a supplement to this life, having the same avocations, duties, enjoyments, etc., as in this, but far more elevated.

5. Our state here determins the initial state there. The "ruling loves" here decide what sphere, so to speak, one will step into there. If he be low and earthly here he will hav to be put on probation over there.

6. Heaven is not attained by either faith or works. Man simply gravitates to the position there for which his life on earth best fits him.

7. There is no instantaneous change of character. We take our habits with us and must climb to higher spheres by gradual improvement—that is repentance.

8. The sufferings there are consequent upon imperfect character, and cannot be escaped except by such repentance.

9. In the next world love ranks higher than wisdom.

10. A trustful, childlike spirit is the best preparation for entrance into the next world.

11. There hav always existed intermundane laws according to which men can obtain under certain conditions revealings from those who hav passed to the next world before them. A certain portion of human beings are more sensitiv to spiritual perceptions and influences than their fellows, and it is usually through or in the presence of these that the intercourse occurs.

12. Spiritual phenomena bring immortality to light, for surmise giv conviction, and assured conviction for wavering belief.

13. The motivs which induce spirits to communicate with men are a benevolent desire to convince us that there is a world to come.

14. When spirit communications are valueless and vapid it is usually because the messages are too assiduously sought, or because the medium is under control of a low order of spirits, or the inquirer is too dogmatic, and exercises an influence over the medium.

This, briefly, is the gist of Spiritualism, its faith and phenomena, as we hav observed it and as one of its "fathers" synthesizes it. This synthesis is largely influenced by the preceding religion held by the author, and shows that religions grow from modifications of preëxisting ones. If Mr. Owen had been reared in India Spiritualism as he explained it would hav been Brahmanic. But all these speculations, of course, possess no value if man has no soul, or if all the phenomena are trickery, or explainable by natural known laws; and it devolves upon the asserters of the soul and another life to show this. These Mr. Owen takes for granted, but the Spiritualists most entitled to confidence are those who are endeavoring to prove a soul and another life by scientific methods.

The Humble Unitarians.

One of the very few sensible observations Mr. B. Tucker has made since he became pope of Anarchy is his comment upon Unity's praiss of the Sabbatarians..

Referring to the efforts of Colonel Shepard and other fanatics to commit the World's Fair managers to the policy of Sunday closing, Chicago Unity says: "We shall be sorry to see the wishes of Colonel Shepard, Dr. Patton, and the rest prevail in this question of the use of the World's Fair on Sunday, but if they do meet with success, their timeliness and watchful care of a principle they believe to be sacred and second in importance to no other, will hav merited the victory."

To which Mr. Tucker responds: "If Colonel Shepard should advocate the lynching of all Free-thinkers or Infidels, would Unity think that any amount of devotion, zeal, and persistence could merit the victory? The principle is the same in both cases."

The Unitarians are queer people. They are always ready to praise their enemies and criticise their friends. Like the slave who hugs his chains and the dog which licks the hand that strikes him, they bow meekly to the authority which would, if it had the power, crush them out of existence. They do this, we believe, in the hope that the evangelicals will some time recognize them as Christians.

The World's Fair.

The status of the movement for the opening or closing of the World's Fair on Sundays may be learned from the following official communication:

"WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION,
"EXECUTIV DEPARTMENT.

"WM. T. BAKER, President.
"THOS. B. BRYAN, Vice-president.
"POTTER PALMER, Second Vice-president.
"BENJ. BUTTERWORTH, Solicitor-Gen'l and Sec.

"CHICAGO, Sept. 28, 1891.

"E. M. MACDONALD, EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: In response to yours of the 21st instant relativ to the question of opening or closing the Exposition on Sunday I hav to say that that question is not being considered by the directory at this time. We will be glad to receive any petitions that you may hav to present and place them with the others relativ to the same subject, in order that they may hav proper attention when the time to settle this question arrives. No action will be taken in the near future.

"Very respectfully,
"BENJ. BUTTERWORTH, Sec. and Sol. Gen."

This was in reply to one asking questions here answered, and also whether the Freethinkers would be accorded a hearing. This last query Mr. Butterworth did not answer, perhaps because he could not say. But when the time does arrive for settling the question we believe the Freethinkers will be on hand and be listened to. In the mean time efforts to influence official opinion and action in the matter should not slacken. Following is the list of the United States commissioners of the World's Columbian Exposition, who will hold office till the Fair closes in 1893, with their post-office addresses. Our object in printing it is to ask each reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER to write to his two state commissioners and ask them to vote against closing the Fair on Sundays. Write to them as often as the thought occurs and get your friends to write also. When the commission meets to consider the question each commissioner ought to be in possession of a few thousand letters protesting against Sunday closing; then he will know what public sentiment is in the matter. Keep this paper, at least the list of commissioners, and write them:

Theology Becoming Anthropology.

The New York Post comments:

"The customary summer jokes about closed churches and clerical trips to Europe hav scarcely had their usual run this year. The practical cessation of church life in the city is accepted as inevitable during the summer time. In other words, the churches hav come to perceive and frankly acknowledge that they are but a part of the life of society, by the customs and trend of which they are and must be largely shaped."

And if they are but a part of society, then they are not divine at all, for divinity is a thing above society and superior to the merely human. That which is divine must be not a part of society but something transcending it. "By the customs and trend of which they are and must be largely shaped," writes the Post. How can an institution of divine founding, code, and authority be shaped and turned by mere man?

"This [shaping of the church by society] has always been an historical fact, as recent investigations of the powerful influence of its environment upon early Christianity hav convincingly shown, but the churches themselvs are more acutely conscious of it now than ever before."

If the church has always been molded by its social environment, it is time that Christians should know the fact. They should know the proportions in which social molding and original impulse hav combined to produce the present church. Perhaps the case is one of total social molding and no nativ divine impulse at all. At least, believers should bethink themselvs of the character of those environments of early Christianity, whose influence was so "powerful." Certainly those environments were very brutal. They were likewise environments of credulity, fable, mendacity, utter untrustworthiness. Christian writers hav always admitted that they were, only asking us to believe that their own special institutions were preserved inviolate by divine care through the hurly-burly of folly and untruth. But if Christians now learn that the church was powerfully affected by its surroundings, they must feel anxiety as to how much of its present constitution consists of that barbarousness and falsehood which it must thus hav drawn in.

"When the church considered itself as in but not of the world, its contact with society at large being mainly for the purpose of rescuing an individual here and there from a corrupt and doomed social order, it inevitably had an air of aloofness and condemnation. But now that it is coming to the conception of Christianity as but an element in the whole movement of civilization, it necessarily feels its solidarity with the social organization in which it exists, and thinks more about bettering and building up society as a whole than of snatching individual brands from the burning. The result is a far kindlier attitude toward projects for social reform, and a measurable recovery of lost enthusiasm through the new interest in sociological studies and experiments."

"The conception of Christianity as but an element in the whole movement of civilization" is a conception widely different from that which the clergy hav been trying to force upon us for centuries. The next step will be to admit that it is not even an element in civilization's movement, if by that is meant a helpful one. It is rather an element of barbarism.

The implication in the Post's line of thought is, of course, true. The church is the outcome of natural social causes. In early ages man was unacquainted with the workings of nature, and easily deceived; professional deceivers of him, called priests, abounded; certain of these hashed together sundry ancient myths and writings, and, securing the arm of an emperor, fastened them upon the multitude in place of former systems. Then the institution thus formed as it passed through varying stages of society varied with those stages. It has in turn raised its voice for monarchy and for democracy; for slavery and for freedom; for obscurantism and for instruction; for capital and for labor; for intemperance and for temperance. The commendable causes in this enumeration, it is needless to say, were espoused by it only in very late times when they hav become irresistibly popular. Moreover, they are supported with less ardor than were their opposits, for they are not so congenial to its nature. They must be, indeed, when fully established, fatal to its existence. Another praiseworthy interest to which the church is lately forced to turn itself is sociology. Sociology, the science of society, bids fair largely to supplant in many seminaries theology, the science of divinity. Says the Post:

"Such displacement is already an accomplished fact in the actual experiences of multitudes among the younger clergy, who leave the church-fathers and the system-makers unopened in order to read the latest monographs of social investigators, and reports on organized charity, prison reform, model coffee-houses, labor organizations, and the like."

Everywhere man is taking the place of God. The worship of man, as Feuerbach explicates, is emerging from its disguise of the worship of God. Anthropology, the study of man, is displacing theology, the study of God.

A Prayer Test.

Mr. M. M. Secor, an ex-mayor of Racine, Wis., proposes a test for the preachers of his town equal to Tyndall's prayer-gage. He had his proposition printed and distributed throughout the city. It is as follows:

"A good proposition to our reverend gentlemen: I will become one of your followers provided you go through the test I prescribe. On some good, stormy day I want our firm believing orthodox ministers to place themselvs on a scow, be taken out into the middle of Lake Michigan and left there without any oars, rudder or sails. But I want them to hav all the Bibles and prayer books they want for their assistance and depend upon the Lord only. No human hand must help them. If they make a success of such a voyage and reach port in safety I will then join an orthodox church and attend regularly, and many others will join me. Prayers and the Lord must save them alone, and no human hand. Yours truly, M. M. SECOR."

Mr. Secor is a Freethinker of course, and not averse to letting his sentiments be known. But up to date the preachers hav not accepted his proposal, and it is to be feared they hav little faith in their Lord.

WE hav not unfrequently thrown light upon the spurious character of the conversion which is pretended to be effected on Jews of this city by the Christian mission. It appears that the forcible conversions in Russia are as unsubstantial as the bribed ones here. E. B. Lanin in his Russian letters in the Fortnightly Review says: "I hav conversed with numbers of 'converted' Jews of all classes of society, and I can affirm that, with few exceptions, not only hav they not the faintest glimmer of faith in Christianity, but they hate the very name, despise its priests, sneer at its ceremonies, and loathe themselvs for perjuring their souls by receiving its sacraments and praising the name of its founder."

Letters from Friends.

A Generous Freethinker Thanked.

WASHINGTONVILLE, O., Sept. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see a letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER from Salem, O, from Mr. Simon Sharp. I see he has renewed my TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I heartily thank Mr. Sharp for his kindness, and I appreciate his gift. I also feel glad that Brother Sharp made inquiries about my character. I remain, Yours truly, JAMES YATES.

Praise Like This Encourages Us.

OTTUMWA, IA., Sept. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I would be glad to see you in person and giv you a hearty big shake. Inclosed find $3 to pay for the best paper in the United States—I would say, in the world, that I ever hav had the pleasure to read. Good health and long life to you and John Peck. May all the blessings that this world can giv fall on Watson Heston.

J. M. PECK, SR.

One Torch in Broome County's Gloom.

LISLE, N. Y., Sept. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find $3 for subscription to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, which I believe to be the best paper on earth. I liv in a priest-ridden community, and am the only Freethinker that has the courage to openly denounce Christianity when openly assailed by the sky-pilots and their followers.

Yours for the freedom of mankind, R. H. GLOVER.

Must Read Up Holy Russia's Doings.

COUNCIL VALLEY, IDA., Sept. 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me through your columns to inquire of the truth seekers if any of them hav copies of the Century Magazine that contain George Kennan's Siberian articles that they would exchange or sell. I failed to read them all and it being necessary that I should hav a copy I would like to correspond with anyone who may hav these numbers of that magazine.

Yours for truth, J. T. TOWNLEY.

Taxpayers Will Vote to Tax the Churches.

LUZERNE, N. Y., Sept. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am very sorry I do not get THE TRUTH SEEKER on Saturday or Sabbath to read on Sunday. I would rather go without my dinner than not hav it. There is some talk about the pansy. All the boarders in this place wear it as a buttonhole flower, and they are not Freethinkers. I like the Wettstein badge, and if I had the money should get one. They are too dear for me. The Nine Demands are good. Why not take one at a time? And now is the time, for almost every man will vote for equal taxation and exemption. Every taxpayer will vote that if he has brains. Yours truly, JOHN HART.

Wake Up and Get a Lecturer.

BLOOMDALE, O., Sept. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: On the evening of the 23d I took my family to North Baltimore to hear Mr. John R. Charlesworth's lecture, "The Principles of Secularism." The trip was a pleasant one, and of course our expectations of the treat in store for us were high up, and to say they were realized would be expressing it tamely. Yes, he surpassed them, and we were thrilled and electrified, and went home with a pleasant impression of Mr. Charlesworth. I can say to all who are thinking of securing the services of a lecturer in the near future that they cannot mistake if they endeavor to get Mr. Charlesworth to visit them on his return trip. Liberals, wake up and come out and show your colors.

Yours, C. C. GERMANN.

Believes the Bible!

WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS., Sept. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am a seeker after truth, but could not conscientiously adopt the same mode of seeking it that most of your correspondents do. I am a believer of the Bible, but not of the deceptiv theology of this age. I am a believer from what I see and know, in connection with what I read in the Bible. I recognize that unbelief is the parent of reform. Infidelity is the Cæsus of the new world; it liberates the captivs from the Babylon of deception in which the Christian world is now enslaved. Infidelity prepares the way for truth, by sweeping the rubbish from the road that leads to it. The road to truth is now so blockaded with rubbish that it is impossible for the Christian world to advance until the rubbish is cleaned out, and this work appears to me to be the purpose or mission of Infidelity.

Christians Tore Down Their Posters.

NASHVILLE, O., Sept. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: John R. Charlesworth, the Liberal lecturer, delivered a course of lectures here on the 14th and 15th of September. It is the first time in the history of Nashville that Freethought lectures hav been given. Opposition was shown toward us, and everything was done to make our meetings a failure. They tore down our posters, tried to prevent us from having the use of the hall, and at one time we anticipated serious trouble, but despite all opposition our meetings were held, and very successful they were. By 7 30 the hall was well filled—the greater portion of the audience being ladies, which shows that the ladies of Nashville and vicinity hav more courage than the men. Mr. Charlesworth spoke on the "History of Christianity" Monday evening and Tuesday evening on "The Depressiv Influence of the Bible." Having a few days at his disposal, Mr. Charlesworth honored us with his company at our rural home, and although the change from city life to our secluded and quiet place must hav been somewhat lonely to him, to us his company was an intellectual feast. During his brief stay in our midst Mr. Charlesworth has made many warm friends who will gladly welcome him at any future time.

Very respectfully, DAN AND LUCY G. PFOUTS.

One Liberal Waits for the Other.

DAYTON, WASH., Sept. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav waited about renewing my subscription, thinking I would get at least one new subscriber, but hav been unable to get any. I loan my papers when I get through with them, as there is a great many who like to read THE TRUTH SEEKER but say they cannot spare the money to subscribe for it. There are a good many Liberals here in and around Dayton, and I should like to see them organized, but they either lack the zeal to go ahead or one waits for the other. We hav not had a Liberal lecture here for a year. I was so in hopes S. P. Putnam would visit us this summer, or some other good lecturer. I would be glad if we could hav a Liberal lecture every week or at least once a month. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER as it is, and like your manner of getting at the truth (but I think it would be interesting to read discussions on all the subjects mentioned in your third question). And now since the consolidation of Freethought with THE TRUTH SEEKER, it will be grander than ever. Having personally met Mr. Putnam, I am glad to welcome him to our TRUTH SEEKER band and his "News and Notes" will be eagerly looked for with each week's issue. Yours for truth and liberty,

MRS. NANCY A. BOGGS.

A Trumpet-Call for Sunday Opening.

MEADVILLE, PA., Sept. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: This is certainly no time for the Liberals to waste their energy and time in discussing about badge-pins or investigating so-called spirit phenomena. The bigots are working with all their might to hav the World's Fair closed on Sunday, and they will hav it closed too if the Liberals do not concentrate their power in opposition to the efforts of these Sunday closers. Let us also remember that effectual work in this line can be accomplished through the American Secular Union. The so-called Christians are in the habit of saying that "Infidelity talks while Christianity works." Work, which terminates in practical results, on our part, is the only thing which will render such a statement false. In a world where humanity is cursed with ignorance and superstition—in a world where there is sorrow and suffering—we certainly hav all we can do without investigating "spirit phenomena." This should be left to the priests who are engaged in making a heaven for themselvs here by telling the people that they will get theirs after they are dead. If we attend properly to this world, the spirit world can take care of itself until we get there, in case we do. If Mr. George L. Andres will read W. B. Carpenter on mesmerism and Spiritualism he will be better able to interpret these phenomena. A truly unselfish person will not be troubled about a future world, but will go to work for the good of this instead. Yours for humanity, A. ZENO.

Parsonic Traits and Tricks.

ORILLIA, ONT., Sept. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I attended divine worship Sunday last; heard Rev. N. R. Grant preach a very nice sermon. He never mentioned the word hell or devil during the whole sermon. I think he forgot them both. On my way home we ran into an evangelist on the street corner. His name is Benner, and he was taking up the gospel where Mr. Grant had left off. The whole street seemed to be filled and the air impregnated with brimstone. God was not in it. Hell-fire and the devil were his trump card. He told another lie about an Infidel who called on God when he was about to go over a waterfall, but was saved by a Christian. It made me sick. He did not giv the name, so I put it down as above. But I must not forget to tell you a story that the Rev. Mr. Grant told before he dismissed us at the church, about Mr. Darcey Macgee. A short time before he was shot at Ottawa he came to Toronto and was entertained by a friend of his who was a Protestant, and when this gentleman was about to commence family prayer, knowing that Mr. Macgee was a Roman Catholic, he presented him with a beautiful book and requested him to take a seat in the parlor until after prayers. Mr. Macgee said it was a most beautiful incident and that he respected his friend so much because he would not giv up his prayers because he had a man of another denomination in the house. But what I want to call your attention to is this: here were two good Christians meeting in the same house and the one could not listen or take part in the act of prayer to their God, and they both claimed to be Christians. S. MOFFATT.

Hold a Freethought Congress at the Exposition.

BALTIMORE, MD., Sept. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I noticed an editorial headed "International Congresses." You advocated a great demonstration of this nature in Chicago during the World's Fair—that we celebrate the anniversary of discovery by inviting our Liberal friends of all nations to impart to us the progress made in Liberalism in the different European countries. This is very noble and a good proposal on your part, and would, I am sure, meet with the approval of every Liberal in the country, if, oh, if! we had a place for our visitors' accommodation and appropriate for a lecture hall. We cannot expect them to be willing to come to this country and let this be the best and strongest congress ever held by thinkers of our mode with the facilities which we hav at the present. With no large and regular hall for such gatherings, we dare say nothing, and let others talk, unless we decide at once what to do. Let the people through your columns know what you think about the plan of hall building. If we show to our foreign friends that we mean business in our expectations we must go to work at once and see what may be done to make our country attractiv enough to postpone the proposed giant demonstration for another year and hav it in America. We hav already something in our favor, the World's Fair, when we hav to celebrate the four-hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America. The next best attraction would be the proposed hall of which I wrote several weeks ago. Now try to answer this and let us know if it is not most proper to hav a stopping-place for our foreign friends before inviting them to come.

I let THE TRUTH SEEKER pass through the hands of a number of friends, and expect to raise a few more subscriptions for your paper. Yours for mental liberty,

SIDNEY J. ROSENTHAL.

Letter from That Horrid Being, a Female Infidel.

FOREST GROVE, ORE., Sept. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot express my sorrow at the loss of our bright and cheery Liberal sheet Freeth ught. I feel so lost when we open the weekly mail and its pleasant face does not greet my sight. Of course it is comforting to say THE TRUTH SEEKER will supply its place, and does splendidly, but that is like telling a mother on the loss of a favorit youngest child that her older children will take its place; they do in a measure, but still there is the "vacant chair." And Freethought was our youngest, a bright and pleasant visitor, which we always welcomed and read first, because it was "ours," our home paper, with news of our own people presented in a bright, fresh, sparkling manner; and we miss it so much. My husband has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since the first copy was issued, consequently you need not send extra copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address. All I did for Freethought was done willingly, gladly, and I feel a personal loss in its suspension. I shall try, however, to get my club for Freethought to renew for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will gladly do all in my power to extend the circulation of your most valuable journal.

Our Oregon state convention of Liberals will meet in Portland the 3d, 4th, and 5th of October, and we hope for a grand rally from all parts of the state. There is much at stake, and plenty of work for every Liberal that can possibly attend. Our field secretary, Mrs. Mattie Krekel, has been doing a grand work this summer, and we must rally to her support and do all in our power to keep her in the field and continue the noble work that has been so faithfully done by her and others of our lecturers in the Liberal cause. Among our other noble workers in the good cause, Dr. J. L. York must always figure as the pioneer of Liberalism on the Northwest coast, and I hope he will meet with us in Portland, so we can giv him the rousing welcome he deserves. We are sure of a grand success in our convention if we can secure such speakers as himself, Remsburg, Putnam, Mrs. Krekel, and others who hav addressed us in the past. Hoping for a grand rally among our friends,

I remain, yours fraternally, SARAH C. TODD,
Sec. Washington Co. Secular Union.

Signs of the Times.

LEXINGTON, KY., Sept. 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We need not be reminded of the fact that the affairs of the world are approaching a crisis, such a one as it has never before experienced. The time is past to bring good out of evil, which cannot be eradicated until it is brought to a head. One argument for the existence of a hell is that evil increases. Holiness and purity can but suffer in the shade of the upas whose breath exhales poison and death. The virtuous soul livs only on the perception of a rich secret, a hidden manna of perfect purity, which renders all vice hideous to its nature. When you become acquainted with the dangerous properties of the poisonous herb, the deadly sicuta of the woods, its terrible sweetness is delicious no longer.

To perpetuate wrong is to cast yourself and the world into an abyss of corruption. The white lily of truth rises above this quagmire. So when thieving and licentiousness are swept away true men and women will rise to the surface. This is evolution.

With foolish zeal let crazy Christians pray;
You can't be wrong when honor leads the way.

The vicious Sunday-school scholar becomes the hardened criminal. Christian parental government is the cause of many evils and hypocrits.

The worship of the rich Christian, who is crafty and selfish, with coarse, degrading morals, is also ruining society.

We know it all. The weak-minded wife, the agonized husband, the fatal shot, the murderer lynched, the soul is sent to paradise. The offense is rank. It smells to heaven.

Society is rotten and falling to pieces. No clergyman or saint has protested against these things. Are the people satisfied? Let them go with Christians and adore the Holy Coat at Treves—then leave there the crutches of their diseased souls. Will you join in the holy fight which occurred when thousands were dying to reach that sacred presence? Did violence ever produce civilized manners? Euripides observed that "the gods should be more wise than human kind." The Holy Coat should soften savage ways.

Happy are they whose intuitions, early training, and unsealed powers of observation, with the result of their reasoning powers, form an aggregate superior to fanatical ideas of God's miracles and grace. ALHAZA.

Capitalism Assailed along with Superstition.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Sept. 23, 291.

MR. EDITOR: Freethought is advancing at a rapid pace now. Upon looking back at past decades the assertion is proved. Unless we retrospect we cannot appreciate how far we hav progressed, if we travel in the right direction. An Arab hut on the ruins of a magnificent temple, or a sculptured portico of Thebes or Karnac, does not denote advancement, but retrogression. Frescoes on the walls of dwellings in Pompeii, though two thousand years old, are in brighter colors than their imitations in Munich or Saratoga, which hav been painted within a few years. Why this disparaging contrast against modern art? Simply because the painters of an age before the Christian era knew of materials which held tints better than any paints of recent times. No modern fresco exposed to outside influences can resist the fading effects of the weather's vicissitudes. In matters of art the Old World is ahead of us, but in Secular matters we are assuredly ahead and are taking giant strides in the way of progress.

In Western states all forms of religious worship are being eliminated from the public schools; Sunday laws are antagonized and generally inoperativ; Freethinkers' testimony in court is accepted, etc.

But what I want to call attention to is the coming social revolution and the part assigned to Freethinkers in the struggle. I can look at political matters impartially, as I am an independent.

In this state of New York one can plainly see, by the opening skirmishes, how the decisiv battles for religious, social, and political freedom will shortly be fought. Roman Catholicism (Tammany Croker, Sheehan, et al) by dominating the Democratic party, obliges the Protestants (Fassett, Masonic Vrooman, et al) to rally in the Republican party.

But as Freethinkers are men who investigate, think, and reason, we are not impulsivly aroused by the brass bands and drums of either old party. Both political "machines" are run by and in the interests of our one common enemy—capitalism.

Who doubts that both nominees for governor purchased the "honor?"

Capitalism, my friends, is our greatest foe, for the money power of private monopoly invariably supports the church and the military force, in order to stifle or to crush the oppressed masses of people.

Let us not be deceived. History repeats itself, and the civil war that is surely coming in a few years will be fought by capitalism and the church, against labor and the secular masses.

As we Freethinkers work on lines that are (1) educational, (2) economic, and (3) political, we can in the progressiv state of New York help our cause by withdrawing our support this year from both Republican and Democratic parties. There is a Socialistic Labor party, with its organ, The People, published every Sunday in New York city. A vote with this party will in no sense be wasted. It is also probable that a People's or Alliance party will shortly be formed.

The articles that hav recently appeared in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER on money and other economic subjects I heartily commend; and I hope that it may continue to be the policy of the editorial management to not utterly exclude economic and political communications. E. J. KIMBALL.

Anecdote of a Freethinker, and Infidel Deathbeds.

BUNDYSBURG, O., Sept. 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am exceedingly sorry to see Freethought go down. It was a spicy journal, and should hav been sustained by the Freethinkers of the land. But as she has had to go down, she has acted wisely in consolidation with THE TRUTH SEEKER, the grandest Freethought sheet I ever saw; whose founder, Bennett, was one of the grandest champions of liberty that the nineteenth century has produced. Peans will be sung in admiration of his name when all of his defamers are dead, damned, rotten, and forgotten.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 5th is before me, and in it is a letter from Joseph Heighton, of Kent, O., twenty-seven miles south of here. I hav known Mr. Heighton for twenty-five years, and when he reads this he will doubtless think it strange that I say so, for I feel quite certain that he will not know me, or even remember of ever seeing me. But I think I can convince him. Mr. Heighton was formerly a singing teacher, and taught in different sections of Portage county, where I formerly lived. He played the violin and sang at the same time, and did so when W. S. Bell lectured at Ravenna, the county seat of Portage county. Mr. Heighton is a very comical gentleman, and I will now relate an anecdote I heard him tell on himself (but I hav forgotten where he was when he told it). As near as I remember, it ran about as follows: He had advertised to sing and play somewhere on a certain night and was on his way with horse and buggy, and overtaking a lady he inquired if she would like to ride. She replied in the affirmativ, and after getting into the buggy she said, "I was going up to hear Mr. Heighton sing and play. I hav always had a great curiosity to see him, for the people say that he is about as black as a nigger." Mr. Heighton had his violin out of sight and said nothing. Finally he came to the building where he was to sing, and seeing a crowd of people standing there was afraid that some one would spoil his surprise upon the lady by saying, "Good evening, Mr. Heighton." But he got her out of the buggy and she went into the house without that, and when the time came for the singing and playing he stepped to the front with his violin. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I trust, can see about how the lady felt who had "always had a great curiosity to see him." Brother Heighton, you can correct all blunders; and R. R. Marsh & Son, of Kent, can tell you who I am.

It is painful to see a preacher employed to speak words of "consolation" when a Freethinker is taken away, and right here I wish to say that in Freethought of July 25, 1891, appears a part of a will of one Alfred Morey, of Gustavus, O., twenty miles northeast of here, which I hope the Editor will publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER for an example to Freethinkers elsewhere.

Two years ago this summer the writer was taken seriously ill, and neither myself nor wife thought that I could liv an hour. I said to her, "Now, if I die, hav no preacher of any kind." The silly, sickening stuff told by Christians, that when Infidels are about to expire they are willing to change their mind, is bosh and worse. Belief must be according to evidence, and if there is no new evidence there cannot be any change of belief. Let priests howl and rail on, they cannot stop the onward march of intellectual liberty.

I recently heard a young preacher say that all schools and advancement of the world are due to Christianity, and that Herbert Spencer believed in a great First Cause. I asked the preacher when through preaching if he would tell me where Mr. Spencer admitted of a great First Cause, and he promised to do so. I am waiting patiently to see.

B. O. FENTON.

He Is a Suicide-God.

BALTIMORE, MD., Sept. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Will you or a reader say whether the first sentence of the attached article is true or false? It may also be interesting to know whether the suicide was or was not that of some religious crank who picked up Mr. Ingersoll's book to answer it, or whether it was afterward thrust into the hands of the corpse by some designing Christian.

Is it not remarkable that a man of some degree of intelligence should hav the effrontery to draw such a startling conclusion?

So Infidelity is to blame for suicide and insanity! And to say this in the face of the fact that the insane asylums throughout the land are crowded with persons rendered insane over the Christian religion; when insane Messiahs are springing up everywhere, and when the number of suicides and murders annually committed in the cause of Christ runs up into the thousands! If Christ was God, he was a suicide-God; for being all-powerful, he could hav saved himself if he so desired, and he who dies for want of an effort to liv is, morally at least, a suicide.

The editor of the Baptist also tells us that "men who do not fear the future, grow weak and cowardly under the burdens of life and think they are escaping them by self-destruction." This assertion is positivly false. There are no braver and more heroic men living than the Freethinkers of to-day, and if the Baptist editor wants to prove his conclusion to be correct, let him put up $1 for every crazy Christian, fifty cents for every Christian suicide, and I think I can safely say the Secularists will pay him $100 for every such one in Freethought ranks.

The religion of Christ is per se the religion of insanity. No one could possibly believe it so firmly as to strictly follow out its requirements without being declared by any jury de lunatico in the land as insane.

For instance, he would take all he has, sell it, and giv it to the church; then, if his eye offended him, he would pluck it out; if his brother smote on one cheek, he would turn the other; he would resist no evil; he would take no thought of to-morrow; he would believe and act up to a conglomeration of contradictions; if taken sick he would send not for a physician, but for the elders of the church, to pray over and anoint him; he would remove mountains by his faith, and taste all manners of deadly poisons, handle rattlesnakes, and do an endless variety of crazy things in his master's name.

And the coroner's jury?

Well, the coroner's jury would simply bring in a verdict of suicide. And the church of Christ would not shed a pitying tear. EDGAR L. STRAUGHTON.

A young man in Brooklyn committed suicide last week, and when his body was found it had clutched in one of its hands a book of Robert Ingersoll's. What immediate connection there was between the book and the suicide we do not know, but we doubt not it was one of cause and effect. Infidelity is to blame for the alarming prevalence of suicides. Men who do not fear the future, because they do not believe in a future, grow weak and cowardly under the burdens of life, and think they are escaping them by self-destruction. The hope which Christ inspires helps Christians to bear life's ills patiently, and even to transmute the black charcoal of sorrow into the diamond of saintly character. What despairing humanity needs is a savior who not only forgivs and cleanses from sin, but bears its burdens. Infidelity offers no hope for the future, and no burden-bearer for the present. The Lord help us to be more constant, persistent, and self-sacrificing in making known to others such a savior.—Baltimore Baptist.

Traditional Ignorance.

ST. CATHERINES, ONT., Sept. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It is to be lamented that there are so many apparently intelligent people, at this age of learning, that still cling to hearsay errors and false beliefs. It is natural generally for children to believe those who are older than themselvs, especially their parents, therefore it is of the utmost importance that parents should tell them the truth. But, strange as it may appear, if a young boy sees a hair-like worm swim on water and asks its parents what it is, if they don't know, they will not tell him so; but will tell him just what their parents hav told them, a lie, that it is a hair-snake, come from a horsehair, that horsehairs turn to hair-snakes when they get in the water. The boy of course believes it, and except he is taught or learns better, he will perhaps always say that he knows horsehairs turn to hair-snakes when they get in water, for his parents told him so, and of course he knows they would not lie; and in that way the lie is handed to generations. When I was about ten (now in my seventy-seventh year) I heard a truthful old man say that if mane or tail hairs of a horse were put in water, they would begin to move in a few minutes, and in a short time would be hair-snakes and swim about. He said that the end that came out of the horse would be the snake's head. I believed him, of course, and remained in ignorance for many years, or until I heard it contradicted, and then I tested it. I pulled mane and tail hairs out of a horse and put them in a large crock of rain water (so they couldn't swim away when alive) in May, when all animated nature was springing into life, and looked at them often for more than five months, but alas! alas! they showed no signs of life, and that convinced me beyond the possibility of doubt that hair-snakes were not transformed horsehairs. Seeing live, hair-like worms in water is no proof that they are transformed hairs; therefore I cannot conceive how any sensible man can conscientiously, without a particle of proof, philosophize or attempt to giv the rationale how hairs of any animal are transformed to live animals, when he, or no other man, has ever seen such a prodigy. I hav seen but two original hair-snakes (Gordius) and they no doubt had lain dormant for some time, for there had been no water where I saw them for some time before it rained, and they were swimming about lively as if they had had a long rest. They were about a foot long and a little thicker than mane or tail horse-hairs.

More false beliefs. In 1886 the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER was asked, "Will wheat turn to chess?" He answered, "No." I wrote, the answer was correct, and what I had seen touching the matter, as did several other farmers, when finally an intelligent farmer wrote forcibly as follows: That he had worked on a farm over fifty years and been a close observer of all crops, and thinks he ought to be a competent witness in the chess case; and he is just as positiv that wheat or timothy will seed, or either will bring chess, as he is that two and two make four; and givs his reasons—when he was twelve years old, he saw a horse eat off wheat, and every stool that he had eaten off brought chess. He had seen hard winters produce chess more or less. He once put wheat in clean new ground, and the snow laid on the low ground all winter but blew off the high ground, and there it was nearly all chess, but on the low ground was beautiful wheat. He was shown a stool of wheat that was part wheat and part chess, the roots being inseparable. He has seen extreme drouths change timothy meadows to chess, but all were right again next year. He knew a man that had seeded eight acres with timothy and it had come up nicely, but the next season it was all cheat, which he cut for hay, and that was the last of the chess, and no man had a nicer timothy meadow after that year than he. He will now tell me something I do not know, viz.: that I cannot raise a single grain of chess from pure chess and clean ground, if it was to save my life. He says his uncle for thirty years offered first $5 then $10 for every bushel of chess so raised, but never got a bushel. He says if a mule will bring his or her kind chess will do the same thing, but not before. There must be a mistake somewhere. He finally cites one who, he says, is perhaps the strongest agricultural writer of the United States as having said: "The man who does not know that wheat will pass to chess, is too big a fool for him to discuss with." I had heard before that chess would not bring chess, but I did not believe it, and was always careful not to sow it, but when I saw such a positiv assertion from a prominent farmer, that I could not raise a single grain of chess from chess, I thought wisely: "Keep silent and test it." It was then winter and I did not want to wait a year and a half to know the result, so I filled a flower-pot with clean ground and put in six grains of chess in January, 1887, and put the pot in a warm stove room and in a few days six blades of chess came up, and after two weeks I put the pot in a cool room, and April 1, 1887, I put the contents of the pot out in the ground, and next June several stalks from each grain yielded chess. I further heard that chess would bring chess for three consecutiv years, but after that it would not grow at all. This I hav also tested, and hav raised chess from chess every year for the last four years, and the chess of last July is now up and growing. I hav now tested chess and different kinds of wheat side by side for the last four years and hav tried the different ways that were said positivly to turn wheat to chess thoroughly and severely, by choking it with other grain whilst growing, tramping it down when frozen, cutting it off when six to ten inches high, flooding it last of April and first of May, and freezing it in winter, and found them all wanting; for in every trial for the last four years, chess has yielded chess and wheat has yielded wheat, except when it was winter-killed, then it yielded nothing. Chess growing where wheat was winter-killed, does not prove that it comes from wheat. And there is no proof that it was wheat that the horse ate off. Stools of chess and wheat apparently from one root hav been seen before, but when they were examined it was found that each had its own root. His uncle's reward for chess from chess is conclusiv proof that his belief, that chess would not bring chess, was based entirely upon false traditional hearsay. And that "strongest agricultural writer" displays gross ignorance, and even anger just because another man cannot be such a fool as to believe what he does, a positiv lie, that wheat will pass to chess. Now, in all the preceding strong assertions there is not a particle of proof that timothy or wheat did turn to chess, nor that chess would not bring chess, proving conclusivly that random, false, and over-positiv assertions are futil without proof. No man should ever attempt to teach others, and especially children, anything that he is ignorant of himself for a fact, for it mentally grieves me yet when I think of the many absurd, gross, and ridiculous lies that hav been infused into my ignorant and credulous mind by ignorant but sincere Bible believers. Therefore truth seekers should be very cautious and never publish anything for a fact before they hav proved it to be a fact. A. MOOT.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Truly Repentant.

Old Nehemiah Nimkins was thrifty as could be,
He kept a host of chickens that, with worthy energy,
Laid one fine egg apiece each day, until their owner grew
To be regarded by his friends as very well to do;
But as he journeyed to the town to sell some eggs one day,
He went so slowly that remorse o'ertook him on the way!

"My sense of honor is aroused," he cried, "and now I spurn
The very thought of taking what my poor dumb creatures earn!
It's downright robbery, I think, to sell the eggs they've made,
And I will cheerfully refund the money they hav made.
Beyond a small commission, the corn used, and the rent
Of the wretched place in which they liv, I'll giv them every cent!

"I'll hav a skillful carpenter, as quickly as he can,
Construct a house of architecture Gothic or Queen Anne;
I'll furnish it with bric-a-brac and paintings old and rare;
I'll place before them every day a generous bill of fare;
And if there's any money left, I'll hav a lawyer fix
My will so I can found a 'Home for Little Orphan Chicks!'"

Biographical Sketches.

VI.—BURNS.

Robert Burns, the famous Scotch poet, was born on the 25th of January, 1759. His father was a nursery-gardener and very poor, but he made every exertion in his power to giv his children as good an education as possible. His children appeared to be very fond of him, and Robert Burns wrote a splendid epitaph, from which I will quote the last verse, as the whole poem would consume valuable space:

The pitying heart that felt for human woe,
The dauntless breast that feared no human pride,
The friend of man, to vice alone a foe,
For even his failings leaned to virtue's side.

At the age of sixteen Burns wrote poetry with Scotch dialect which attracted considerable attention, and young Burns began to get popular. It was rather unfortunate popularity for him though, as he now moved with the "hail-fellows-well-met," and began to "sow his wild oats," or in other words get dissipated. Like all passionate people he was rash and impulsiv—although his impulses were of good intention and harmed no one but himself. At one time he was employed in an office of exciseman which promised a steady increase of salary. Burns now resided in Edinburgh and had plenty of opportunity to observe the injustice of the rich toward the poor. People were greatly excited then over the French Revolution and anyone who professed to hold Liberal opinions was too wicked to be beheaded or hanged. So among the "hail-fellows" Burns confided his sympathies with the Revolution, and the confidants were just mean enough to report to the headquarters and had it not been for an influential friend Burns would hav lost his position. As it was he was allowed to retain it with the remark that he must behave himself in the future. It cut off all chance of his becoming promoted, and his "hail-fellows" now refused to recognize him. So much for human friendship. No wonder he exclaimed in his ode to Despondency:

Oppress'd with grief, oppress'd with care,
A burden more than I can bear,
I sit me down and sigh;
Oh, life thou art a galling load,
Across a rough, a weary road,
To wretches such as I!

Burns is said to hav been very handsome—tall and dark, dark hair and eyes, and very muscular. When in the company of ladies his conversation was more brilliant and witty than when in the company of his own sex He had fits of melancholia, and in the society of ladies these fits would wear off. Perhaps that is why he was "constantly a victim of love." In 1788 he married Jean Armour. Burns and his wife are said to hav lived happily together. Mrs. Burns was devoted to her husband, and for his rashest impulses he received nothing but tender forgivness. In 1795 he lost his little child, to whom one of his most pathetic poems is dedicated.

Oh, still I behold thee all lovely in death,
Reclined on the lap of thy mother,
When the tear trickled bright, and the short, stifled breath
Told how dear ye were aye to each other.

It was not long before Burns followed his child. After the humiliating experience in the excise office he began to grow more dissipated and drank hard and sank into melancholic fits. An unusual exposure brought on rheumatism, from which he never recovered. His doctors at first prescribed a change of scene, and the poet took a notion that swimming would benefit him, so they went to the beautiful little firth of Solway. But soon after, fever set in, and he died on July 21, 1796, just one year from his child's death. Thus ended one poet's career, where virtue and passion are strongly mixed.

IDA A. BALLOU.

A Little Nonsense.

"Boys, be wise, here comes a fool!" exclaimed a great theologian, ceasing to amuse himself by jumping over chairs and tables as he saw a solemn, pedantic friend approaching.

"You don't know the luxury of playing the fool," said Lord Chancellor Eldon, as he danced in his own dressing-room to a tune of his own singing.

"You are a father, Senor Ambassador, and so we will finish our ride," said Henry IV. of France when the Spanish minister discovered him riding round the room on a stick with his son.

Dugald Stewart, the philosopher, was once found by a friend trying to balance a peacock feather on his nose. His competitor in this contest of skill was Patrick Fraser Tytler, the historian.

Dean Swift used to amuse himself by harnessing his servants with cords and driving them up and down stairs and through the rooms of the deanery.

Faraday played marbles and ball with little boys, and took part in charades, playing once the "learned pig."

William Pitt delighted to romp with children. He was once playing with his niece and nephews, who were trying to blacken his face with a burnt cork. A servant announced that two members of the cabinet desired to see him on business "Let them wait in the other room," said Pitt, catching up a cushion and belaboring the girls and boys. They got him down and were actually daubing his face, when he said, "Stop; this will do. I could beat you all, but we must not keep these grandees waiting longer" A basin of water and a towel were brought in and the great prime minister washed his face, hid the basin, and then received the two lords.

Dr. Battie, an eminent London physician, used to amuse himself by gazing at the Punch and Judy show. He was such a successful mimic of "Punch" that he once saved a patient's life by imitating that character. The patient was suffering from a swelling in the throat, and the doctor, turning his wig, appeared at the bedside with the face and voice of "Punch." The sick man laughed so heartily that the swelling broke, and a complete cure followed. Man is the only animal who can laugh; he, therefore, relishes a little nonsense.—Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

MORELIA, MICHOACAN, MEXICO,
Sept. 23, 1891.

MISS WIXON: I hav been wishing to write a few lines for the Corner, and by so doing make the acquaintance of some of THE TRUTH SEEKER's subscribers.

In this letter I will giv a brief description of the mental development of the nativ of Mexico.

Having but a limited use of Shakspere's swift language, I am unable to make myself understood, but with the assistance of one of the Cornerites I am very glad to send you this letter, thus proving my interest in the paper.

The whole population of Mexico is about twelve million inhabitants, two-thirds being Indians. These are completely ignorant and uncivilized, living in a more abject state than at the time of the Spanish conquest, because they hav lost even the traditions of their past comparativ grandeur and glory.

In Yucatan, Campeache, and Sonora states some few thousands of these Indians serve as a perpetual menace to civilization, as they will not act in obedience to the authorities. They liv a nomadic life and persecute progressiv ideas in all ways possible.

History from fifty years back, in the Yucatan and Campeache states, is mainly of sorrowful remembrance, on account of the horrors and violence executed by Indians.

Of the four million inhabitants remaining three-fourths hav a very little instruction, though about one-half of these can scarcely read and write. This class is a mixture of Indians and Europeans. Their social habits are upon a very low plane, and as to their religious propensities they are perfectly Catholicized; their fanaticism being so stupid and miserable as to call out the pity of those who know how these wretches are enslaved. Of course their moral ideas are as absurd as they are limited. These men are intolerant, hard-hearted, and apt to embrace the lower passions and practice the most pernicious vices. They persecute to death those who do not believe as they do, and many murders hav been committed, in which Protestants, Liberals, and Freemasons hav been the victims. Protestantism nevertheless has made some proselytes, in the ratio of one five thousandth.

As to the one million inhabitants who can properly be called civilized, their social culture is on a level with the European's. In this class there are persons who for scientific knowledge and ability may be compared with the most prominent Old World savants. But even in this superior class Catholic fanaticism is extensiv and powerful, though somewhat modified as to personalities. Protestantism has made some converts, in a ratio of one one-hundred-thousandth, Spiritualism and Freethought doctrins one one-thousandth.

These ratios are to be understood as applying to the whole population, and differing in location according to the education of the people.

Towns in which fanaticism exceeds and surpasses all else, may be named as follows: Lueretaro, Morelia, Zamora, Leon, Durango, Tlaxcala, etc.

Some few Liberal papers are published, as follows: El Siglo Diez y Nueve, El Par Aido Liberal, El Combate, in Mexico City; La Reforma, in Merida, Yucatan; El Pueblo, in Toluca, state of Mexico, and some others, La Reforma being the most popular among them.

In the past year, 1890, I hav published in the city of Zacatecas a genuin Freethought weekly journal entitled El Hijo del Pueblo (People's Son), but it has discontinued on account of my removal to this city, in which for several weeks I hav published another paper called El Investigador (The Investigator), but it has also discontinued on account of hostilities I hav received from the people and consequent injury to my business.

Clergymen do not cease in their work of increasing and maintaining fanaticism and error between people.

The whole intellectual progress of Mexico will become no better till an obligatory and laical law (which is at present under discussion in Pedagogical Congress) shall be enforced. I should be glad to correspond with some Freethinkers, men and women, who wish information about any business pursuits in this country which offers such a vast field for all kinds of enterprise.

Wishing the Corner and the brave TRUTH SEEKER success, I am your Liberal and devoted friend, DR. L. E CALLEJA.

CHILDREN early commence to reason, as the answer of a nine-year-old boy who is reported to hav said to his mother, who told him that his signing the temperance pledge didn't amount to anything, proves. "Maybe not, but if dad had signed one when he was nine years old he might hav amounted to something." It would hav been better for him to hav said "father," but he lived up to the English he had heard and should not be blamed. His philosophy was right, if his use of English was out of order.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

GLADSTONE proposes abolition of entail, with consequent destruction of the nobility.

SPECIAL prayers for relief of Russian Jews hav been prepared for all English synagogs.

ON the 3d at Newcastle in pious Delaware several offenders were whipped and pilloried.

MISS KUBLER, of Baltimore, has been obliged to embrace Judaism to marry a Hebrew lover.

BOULANGER on the 30th ult. killed himself on the grave of his mistress. Loss of prestige was the cause.

A BRIDGE near Prague over which the Austrian emperor was to cross was attempted to be destroyed by dynamite.

PROF. HENRY KIDDLE, who was forced from his office of superintendent of New York schools because of his conversion to Spiritualism, is dead.

THE statue of Leo XIII. blessing the world at the Washington Catholic University was unveiled on the 28th ult. The pope has made the presenter, Mr. Loubat, a count.

AT an all-night revival in a negro church at Jacksonville, Fla., flickering of gas lights aroused superstitious fears, and amid cries of "Judgment!" the crowd fled with a rush in which four were killed and twenty injured.

IN a London church on the 27th ult. a man rose and said, "Christ is coming. He has appointed me to announce it in all the churches and I want to address the congregation." He then began shouting. He had become crazy through religion.

JUDGE PASCHAL at Uvalde, Tex., on the 29th ult. created a sensation by refusing naturalization papers to R. V. Sauer, because he is a Socialist. In his written opinion Judge Paschal said that Socialism and Anarchism are directly opposed to the Constitution, and no Socialist or Anarchist is eligible to American citizenship. Sauer will appeal.

PROFESSOR WINSCHIED, of Leipsig, Germany, who belongs to one of the most noted Catholic families, has announced his conversion to Protestantism. This in itself would hav created a sensation. But its effect on Catholics may be imagined when it is coupled with the statement that the professor attributes his change to disbelief in the authenticity of the Holy Coat, and conscientious scruples against supporting a church that would sanction it.

ROME has overruled Connecticut in the case of William Grant, of Bridgeport. He was divorced by civil law and married again. Becoming a Catholic, he desired an ecclesiastical divorce also. The first ecclesiastical court, under Vicar-general Hughes, held him still married to his first wife; the second, the archiepiscopal tribunal of Boston, decided the first marriage null because made by a Methodist minister; finally the highest authorities at Rome hav reaffirmed the first decision.

ON the 2d one of the French pilgrims to the Vatican while visiting Victor Emanuel's tomb spat in the book for visitors' names and wrote, "Life to the pope! Death to King Humbert! Curses on Victor Emanuel!" An Italian struck the pilgrim and helped the guards expel him. Other pilgrims took the part of the insulter with blows. Crowds attacked the pilgrims with stones and knives and chased them over the city. Eight trains were held ready the next morning to take away the pilgrims if the populace became too violent. The pope expressed regret, and commanded the pilgrims not to resent the hostil demonstrations of the bands of men who began to parade singing anticlerical and patriotic songs. Mobs compelled proprietors of hotels at which pilgrims were stopping to replace the papal with the Italian flag. They demanded removal of the pontifical arms from the facade of the Catholic seminary, but were driven away by the police.

RUSSIAN peasants are eating bread made of straw, sweepings from flour mills, dung, or pigweed. Seed corn furnished by government has been in many cases eaten and the land left fallow. Many villages hav been burnt, the peasants, too weak to exert themselvs and devoid of hope of good in any event, not attempting extinguishment. Some fell on their knees and prayed God to quench the fire. A traveler writes: "It is a horrible thing to witness wholesale mortality. Within the first half hour I met sixteen poor creatures at the last extremity of woe. Most had not touched bread for over a week. With distorted features and glaring eyes they glared at me, many of them just able to stretch out their hands for the food I offered them. A few only had strength enough to eat it. They generally die before help comes. Many seemed indifferent to all that was going on; they were evidently resigned to their fate. Others raved in their despair, moving about, gesticulating wildly, and crying, 'Bread, bread; do not let us starve!' Mothers whose children hav succumbed to hunger wander through the villages weeping aloud for their lost little ones. In one locality out of 150 families 47 hav died of hunger."

HAMAN MAKETH A MISCALCULATION.

So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai. Then was the king's wrath pacified.—Esther vii, 10.

Mentioned by W. E. Gladstone in his work, "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture."
G. W. Foote in the Freethinker recommends it as an excellent text-book. He says: "The manner is good and the style is bright. The reader is carried along on an easy flowing stream of science, history, ethics, and common sense."
Chas. Watts in Secular Thought pronounces it to be the best work the author has written.
And THE TRUTH SEEKER says: "This is an excellent book which we can recommend to our readers as clear in language, trustworthy in statement, and irrefutable in reasoning."

SCIENCE IN PLAIN LANGUAGE.

I. EVOLUTION, ANTIQUITY, BACTERIA, ETC. By William Durham, F.R.S.E.

II. ASTRONOMY, SUN, MOON, STARS, ETC. By William Durham, F.R.S.E.

These handy series of volumes on science—of which the above works form the first two numbers, others to follow—are written in a way that cannot fail to make them interesting to even the most casual reader. They supply a popular need. The price of each is 50 cents in cloth.

Gems of Thought.

THE church is changing in accord with the spirit of the age. As interest and belief in doctrins subside, the church organization becomes useful in social and benevolent schemes.—Robt. C. Adams.

I DO not believe that the Bible, when properly understood, is, or ever has been, a comfort to any human being. Surely, no good man can be comforted by reading a book in which he finds that a large majority of mankind hav been sentenced to eternal fire.—Ingersoll.

ONE fact must be familiar to all those who hav any experience of human nature. A sincerely religious man is often an exceedingly bad man. Piety and vice frequently liv together in the same dwelling, occupying different chambers, but remaining always on the most amicable terms.—Reade.

WHEN the voice of authority is no longer raised to stifle intellectual inquiry, science will cease altogether to wear a negativ aspect, and will gain universal recognition as the great constructor of whatever is sound in knowledge or of practical value in life; while religion will embrace the emotions and convictions that come to man from the contemplation of the all-comprehending universe and its Transcendent Cause.—Professor Youmans.

NOTWITHSTANDING there may be much good obtained from a knowledge of the scriptures; notwithstanding they are venerable for their antiquity, and curious for much of what they contain, yet, after all, I ask of any honest and well-meaning parent, how he can justify to himself bringing up his children in reverential belief of such a book as the Bible? Is there a book in existence that contains more filth and more falsehood? —Kneeland.

HEREIN was seen the culmination and decline of the bull "Summis Desiderantes" [against witchcraft]. It had been issued by nim whom a vast majority of the Christian world believes to be infallible in his teachings to the church as regards faith and morals; yet here was a deliberate utterance in a matter of faith and morals which even children now know to be utterly untrue.—Prof. A. D. White.

CIVILIZATION has raised many things formerly considered as, perhaps, immoral and as offenses against the moral law to well-defined crimes. The result is, that we are constantly increasing the work of criminal courts; the number of sentences is thus increased comparativly, even when the volume of crime, as shown by the comparisons of crime per se, may decrease. So truthful statistics may show absolutely false conclusions, unless the elements are intelligently and honestly used.—Commissioner Wright.

No Bible, if it is to retain its influence, should ever be translated into a language understood, or even half understood, by the people. Well the church of Rome knew this, and determinedly it resisted translation out of "the original tongues." . . . But there is one effectiv set-off against the evil of translating the Bible: few really read it, even after it has been translated. If you find a man here and there who has really read the Bible, he is always more or less an "Infidel." The true Christian does not read it; he only praises it. He givs it a conspicuous place in his house—in some parts of England I hav seen it, large and gilt, do duty as an ornament for the window-sill; it is in his hand every Sunday at least, and I know one or two saints who carry it constantly in their pockets; and yet they know nothing of where it came from, and next to nothing of what is in it.—Saladin.

LET us now compute the immense number of slaves which fanaticism has made, whether in Asia, where uncircumcision was a mark of infamy, or in Africa, where the Christian name was a crime, or in America, where the pretext of baptism absolutely extinguished the feelings of humanity. Let us compute the thousands who hav been seen to perish on scaffolds in the ages of persecution, or in civil wars by the hands of their fellow-citizens, or by their own hands, through excessiv austerities and maceration. Let us survey the surface of the earth, and glance at the various standards unfurled and blazing in the name of religion; in Spain against the Moors, in France against the Turks, in Hungary against the Tartars; at the numerous military orders, founded for converting Infidels at the point of the sword, and slaughtering one another at the foot of the altar they had come to defend. In a word, let us contemplate the horrors of fifteen centuries, all frequently renewed in the course of a single one; unarmed men slain at the feet of altars; kings destroyed by the dagger or by poison; a large state reduced to half its extent by the fury of its own citizens; the nation at once the most warlike and the most pacific on the face of the globe, divided in fierce hostility against itself; the sword unsheathed between the sons and the father; usurpers, tyrants, executioners, sacrilegious robbers and blood-stained parricides violating, under the influence of religion, every convention divine or human;—such is the deadly picture of fanaticism.—Voltaire.

Notes and Clippings.

ONE of our clergymen says he prefers a Puritan to a devil's Sabbath. There are people who, at this season of the year, take to the woods when they hav to choose between the two.

THE Rev. Sam Jones was once a drayman in Cartersville, Ga. Perhaps it was in those days that Sam learned the mule-driving methods he has since introduced into evangelism.

A BOSTON genius sent to the Globe a list of twenty-five books which contain "excellent material for deep thought and hard study." The Bible is No. 1, and a "Handbook on Etiquet" No. 4. Most Bostonians, however, are perfectly willing to get along without the Bible if they hav the "Handbook on Etiquet" and Hoyle's "Games" on hand.—Sun.

THE Rambler, a prominent Romish paper of England, says: "You ask if the pope were lord of this land and you were in a minority, what he would do to you? That, we say, would entirely depend on circumstances. If it would benefit the cause of Catholicism he would tolerate you; if expedient he would imprison, banish you — probably he might even hang you. But be assured of one thing, he would never tolerate you for the sake of your glorious principles of civil and religious liberty."

THE Jewish Messenger, in referring to the management of Jewish institutions in this city, says: "Not many years ago, if a man withdrew from the synagog it was imperativ that he should not be considered among those eligible for office in any of our institutions. Now, on the contrary, a man may openly boast of having discarded all Judaism, of having no connection whatever with the sect or creed, and he is calmly selected for a responsible directorship in a Jewish institution because of supposed trade influence."

A SABBATH-KEEPING railroad is to be built in Europe. The village of Sainte Croix in the Jura, which makes a great many clocks and musical boxes, has been long anxious to get a railway down the mountain to connect with Yverdon. At last a wealthy man, named Barbey, offered to build it at his own expense, on the condition that for twenty-five years there shall be no traffic on Sundays. His condition was accepted, and the road, to cost about half a million of dollars, will be opened next year.

THE news comes from Philadelphia of a great change in the manners and customs of the Quakers. The women hav discarded their little black bonnets and sedate black dresses with white collars for more modern costumes, and their "thou" and "thee" of address are as unfamiliar as their old style of dress. A good many of the orthodox Quakers hav begun to show preference for the Hicks doctrin. It is mainly in the South now that the Quakers follow in the footsteps of their old leaders.

AN OLD GRUDGE.—THE SPECTER THAT STILL CURSES WOMAN.

IN Ekaterinodor a girl twenty-two years old has been condemned to deprivation of all rights, imprisonment at hard labor for the term of six years, and expulsion to "one of the distant places of Siberia" after the lapse of that term. Her crime consisted of proclaiming herself a prophetess of the Holy Virgin, and converting other girls of her age to her heretical beliefs. Sixteen of her converts between twenty and twenty-five years, received milder sentences; they were only deprived of their personal rights and exiled to "less distant" districts of Siberia. In the terminology of the Russian court, the "distant places of Siberia" means the most northern region, where the population is very sparse, and where there are hardly any roads between the settlements. Places that are nearer to civilized settlements are described as "less distant," and those in the neighborhood of large cities and nearest to the free governments are termed simply "Siberia."

SYDNEY SMITH once said of some preachers who flourished in his day: "They aim at nothing in their sermons, and hit it." This reminds us of a quaint comment we once heard on a rabbi, that "he tried harder to say nothing and succeeded better than any man in the Jewish pulpit."

THE famous St. Bernard dogs are very carefully trained. A traveler who visited some of the monasteries of the monks of St. Bernard a few years ago found the monks teaching their dogs from the earliest stages of puppyhood. Not only is physical and mental training included in their teaching, but spiritual culture is by no means neglected. At meal-time the dogs sit in a row, each with a tin dish before him containing his repast. Grace is said by one of the monks; the dogs sit motionless with bowed heads. No one stirs until the "amen" is spoken. If a frisky puppy partaker of his meal before grace is over an older dog growls and gently tugs his ear. All with as much sense as the two-legged pupils of monks and priests.

HATERS of the Sabbath must feel glory in the recollections of the time during the French Revolution of 1789 when a Sabbath was totally abolished. The national convention which declared France a republic, determined to abandon Christianity and to substitute instead the worship of liberty, equality, and reason; churches were quickly despoiled, civic feasts substituted for religious festivals. The convention also enacted that time instead of being reckoned from the birth of Christ should thereafter count from the birthday of French revolution, the year to begin anew from that date, September 22, 1792. That the Christian Sabbath might not be observed, the months were to consist of thirty days each, a day of rest being granted only at the close of each decade (every ten days). Under the directory established by the constitution in 1795, the laws of Robespierre were repealed, the churches were reopened, and Sunday took its old place in the calendar.

THE Chilians are very superstitious, so in their latest battle the opposition sent out with their fighting line a tall man, in a black top hat and robed in white, his duty being to expose himself to view as often as possible. He was seen by several regiments, who declared him a deity, and state that several volleys were directed against him, all of the shot passing completely through his body without killing him or doing him any harm whatever.

The Resurrection of Jesus—Did It Happen?

It was Paul who made the memorable declaration that "If Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain and your faith is also vain." We need not stop now to discuss whether it was a spiritual or a material body that came out of the grave. Christians in all ages hav differed upon this point while holding to what they regard as the fact of the resurrection.

But was the resurrection a fact? Like all other extraordinary stories its truth or falsehood must be decided by reference to its reasonableness, its conformity to human experience, and by the weight of evidence that can be brought in support of it. And we must be careful in the examination of such evidence. In the early ages we must remember Christians did not hesitate to forge evidence to suit their purpose. But most of these forgeries, as Gibbon points out, are now "wisely abandoned" by Christians themselvs.

Now, what evidence hav we of this alleged resurrection? Independent evidence—that is, evidence outside of the four gospels? Positivly none. Not a solitary historian except the admittedly forged passages already referred to even mentions the matter. Yet if a man or a God had risen from the dead historians would certainly hav mentioned it. Resurrections of the dead were not of such frequent occurrence even in those dark days of credulity for historians to pass them by without notice. What evidence, then, hav we in support of such an extraordinary event? The evidence of the writers of the gospels and of these only. And what is the value of their testimony? Do they agree? Do they write as though they were eye-witnesses of the alleged occurrence? Do they say "we saw this or we saw that?" Or do they not rather write as though they were merely recording what they were told or what they believed, and as though they had no positiv knowledge themselvs on the subject?

It is a law of evidence that if two witnesses are testifying as to certain facts and they contradict one another upon important points the evidence of one or both of them is at once called in question.

M. Renan, however, says (Life of Jesus, page 27): "When we hav two accounts of the same fact it is extremely rare that the two accounts agree. Is not this a reason for anticipating many difficulties when we hav but one? We may say that amongst the anecdotes, the discourses, the celebrated sayings which hav been given us by the historians there is not one strictly authentic. Were there stenographers to fix these fleeting words? Was there an annalist always present to note the gestures, the manners, the sentiments of the actors?"

If we were dealing with the ordinary events of daily life we should not expect a perfect agreement in all details, but when we are considering, as in this case, the evidence of alleged inspired writers not on a matter of small but one of vital importance to all seekers after truth, we are bound to be strict in our requirements that the evidence shall be perfectly trustworthy. Moreover, if we were merely considering the value of the alleged teachings of Jesus surely we should be entitled to ask what means we hav of knowing that the gospels contain a correct statement of the utterances of the prophet of Nazareth. Surely M. Renan would not expect us to accept any statement, however unskillfully worded, as the correct statement of the teachings of Jesus. If M. Renan were to make an important speech and his speech were reported by unskillful reporters who did not understand shorthand, and whose memories were not sufficiently good to enable them to giv even a fair statement of what was said, would M. Renan be satisfied, and say, "These men hav reported what they understood me to say? It is true they do not agree in their statements, for they are entirely at variance the one with the other, but then two statements of the same fact 'rarely agree.' The reporters all agree that I made a speech, and the exact words I uttered are therefore unimportant."

But how much more important is it when witnesses are testifying to a most extraordinary event—an event which is opposed to all ordinary experience—that they should agree in all the facts.

Let us, however, fairly examin the evidence and see what we shall find. In the first place we find that Matthew is the only writer who says that guards were placed to watch the grave in expectation of the resurrection of Jesus.

Matthew affirms that the chief priests and Pharisees went to Pilate and informed him that Jesus had declared that after three days he would rise again from the dead. "They demanded accordingly that the sepulcher should be made sure till the third day, lest the disciples might come by night and steal the body and say to the people, 'He is risen from the dead.' Pilate, without further comment, says: 'You hav a watch; go and make it as sure as you can'" (Scott's English Life of Jesus, p. 312).

Thomas Paine thought that as the Christian writers brought Jesus into the world in a mysterious manner it was only natural that they should take him out of the world in an equally mysterious fashion; the story of the resurrection, therefore, is the natural corollary of the alleged supernatural birth of Jesus. Not only do the gospels not agree respecting the resurrection itself but they are at variance in every alleged incident from the time of the crucifixion to the resurrection.

Many marvelous occurrences were said to hav accompanied and followed the crucifixion of Jesus.

In two of the gospels (Mark and Luke) we hav a great darkness mentioned that lasted from the sixth to the ninth hour, and which was said to hav spread all over the land; also that when Jesus died the veil of the temple was rent in twain. Matthew mentions this latter occurrence and adds that at the same time an earthquake took place which rent the rocks and opened the graves, and that from the graves there came forth many bodies of the saints and they went and showed themselvs in the city appearing unto many. The resurrection of the saints is only mentioned in Matthew, whilst John is silent respecting the whole occurrence. Now if an earthquake had happened such as this Jewish historians would hav certainly recorded it; but there is no mention of it from any reliable source, and as to the alleged darkness it could only happen as a natural phenomenon at the time of an eclipse, but, as was known by Thucydides four hundred years before, such an event can only take place at the new moon, yet the gospel writers imagin the Jews to hav been so ignorant of astronomy as to suppose that the darkness occurring at paschal full moon was an ordinary event (Scott's English Life of Jesus). When Christians attempt to support this story by reference to eclipses which are alleged to hav occurred at the death of Cæsar, they are merely trying to support one false statement by another. If an earthquake took place which rent the temple and opened the rocks, the temple would assuredly hav fallen and hundreds of people would probably hav been destroyed.

But what about the saints going into the Holy City, and exhibiting themselvs to many? Who were the many? What were their names? Where did they liv? Why did they not go to the unbelieving Jews? Why not confront Pontius Pilate himself? Why not go to the historians and testify that whereas they were once dead, they were now alive? How is it that Matthew alone mentions this marvel? Were Mark, Luke, and John ignorant of it? Or did they not think it worth recording? And what became of these saints after their resurrection? Are they alive now? Or hav they for the second time passed "through the valley of the shadow of death?" Surely it requires very little exercise of the reason to lead the inquirer to the conclusion that the story is not historically true.

But come to the resurrection itself, and see what a careful examination of the various narrativs shows. They demonstrate, first, that the gospel writers could not hav been eye-witnesses, for their accounts are full of inconsistencies and contradictions of a most glaring kind. And, secondly, that they got their story from sources of a perfectly unreliable character.

In Matthew (xxiii, 1, etc.) we are told that two women came to the sepulcher as the day began to dawn; but according to Mark three women came after the sun had risen.

In Matthew the women find that an earthquake has taken place; they find also an angel sitting upon a stone, which has been rolled away from the door of the sepulcher. This angel who is sitting upon the stone tells the two women not to be afraid; that the Lord has risen and gone to Galilee, where he will meet his disciples; the women then depart, and Jesus appears to the women and repeats to them what the angel has previously said.

Mark tells us that three women (not two) come to the sepulcher, and that they come for the purpose of anointing the body of Jesus. No mention is made of an earthquake. When they arrive they find the stone removed; they enter the sepulcher (which the women in Matthew do not), they do not see an angel, but a young man who is clothed in a long white garment, and he speaks to them in the same terms as the angel in Matthew.

Luke (xxiv) mentions an indefinit number of women coming early in the morning, bringing spices for the purpose of embalming the body of Jesus; they also find the stone removed, enter the sepulcher, and see two men in shining garments. These men inform the women that the resurrection had been foretold by Jesus (which they had either never heard or forgotten); that he had risen, but nothing is said by either of his going to Galilee to meet his disciples. Nor does Jesus appear unto the women himself, as he is represented to hav done in St. John xx, 1, etc. Mary Magdalene comes alone to the sepulcher "early, when it was yet dark." On her arrival she finds the stone rolled away, but she does not enter the tomb as the others are said to hav done, but hastens back to Peter, James, and the beloved disciple, and tells them "that they [the Jews] hav taken away the Lord from the sepulcher, and we know not where they hav laid him."

Here there is no mention of Jesus having risen; consequently Peter runs to the tomb, but the other disciples, being fleeter of foot, outrun him. When Peter arrives he goes into the tomb and sees the linen clothes, but the body of Jesus has gone. Mary, who has also come to the grave, weeps on hearing that Jesus is not there. As she stoops, two angels in white appear, one at the foot, the other at the head, where the body of Jesus had lain. The angels ask Mary why she weeps and she answers, because she does not know where the body of Jesus is, whereupon she turns around and sees Jesus standing, but is unable to recognize him, notwithstanding the fact that he speaks to her and asks, "Why weepest thou?" but she actually supposes him to be a gardener. When, however, Mary does recognize him and calls him master, Jesus answers abruptly: "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my father." Now, in nearly every detail the gospel writers are at variance. One writer says that Mary came alone to the grave; others say that others came with her; one says that it was dark; another says that the sun had risen; one says the women went into the tomb; another says they remained outside; one says they saw one angel standing; another says they saw two sitting; one says when Jesus saw the women he allowed them to embrace his feet; another says that he said to Mary, "Touch me not," etc. These are a few of the contradictions and inconsistencies, but they might easily be multiplied by a more careful examination. But here we hav enough to show that the writers of the gospels could not hav been eye-witnesses of the events they narrate. And if they were not eye-witnesses, what is the value of their evidence? It is merely hearsay; indeed it will be seen upon examination to rest most exclusivly upon tradition.

Some writers take the ground that Jesus was not quite dead when he was taken from the cross and agree with M. Renan (Vie de Jesus) that he was brought back to consciousness by the warmth of the spices which were placed about him.

A modern writer I once heard affirm that Jesus was hypnotized, and that was how it was that when the soldiers pierced his side water rushed out and not blood. But if Jesus did not die by crucifixion, how did he die and when? That's the question. And what of the ascension? If the resurrection was a myth, was the ascension a myth also? Let us see.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Secundum Artem.

I remember that once, when very religious, I was talking with my father-in-law, who was very much the other way, and quoted to him the Bible saying that "the natural man perceiveth not the things of God," etc.; when I was somewhat taken aback by the reply, that he didn't care whether the natural man or the artificial man was under discussion. Somehow the word artificial, used in this connection, made a lasting impression on my mind. I hav often wondered whether, since religion is mainly artifice and deception, the religious man is not in reality much more of an artificial being than otherwise.

In the same predicament, it appears to me, are many of the embodiments of human cerebration (misnamed thought) which characterize the political theories emanating from that school of theorists which perpetually studies maxims instead of markets, fancies instead of facts.

The single taxers want "natural opportunities," which means "the land, the air, the mines, the sunshine, etc.;" and yet "they do not want the land, but the rental value of land for public purposes." In short, they do not know what they want. One of them says that this must relieve the farmer, as his taxes are levied mainly on improvements. If it relieves the farmer, who is going to pay his rent? Does it propose to make all farmers tenants of the government? In Kansas less than one-half of the taxes paid by the ordinary farmer is levied on improvements. I own a farm of forty acres on which I pay $12 annual tax. I could rent it for $120. Would it benefit me to raise my taxes to the full rental value of the land, $120, and then deduct the tax on improvements, $6? Even if improvements were proportionally considered, the rental tax would be still $60, or five times what it is now. But raw land situated where mine is would rent for more than that. As to the air and sunshine, which are so useful to make "chestnuts" grow, any "silly" tramp can get more of them than he likes in a Kansas hay-field at present, at $1 25 per day and board, if he is not too much attached to the Lord's Prayer and the story of the lilies and sparrows.

The fiat money advocates say they do not want either gold, silver, or promises to pay. They want pieces of paper with simply the words "one dollar" printed on them to pass for money. They seem to think that the wealth of the country is sufficient to keep any kind of money in circulation at par value. The most prominent leaders of the movement now propose to issue five billion dollars of this kind of money in addition to one billion three hundred million dollars of different kinds of money now in circulation, making over six billions in all, or eighty dollars per capita.

Well, if the sixty billions of wealth in the United States can float six billion dollars at par of this irredeemable currency, the one hundred million dollars of A. Carnegie ought to be sufficient basis for ten million dollars of the same kind of money. Now suppose Mr. Carnegie should take ten million strips of paper and print the words "one dollar" on each one of them, how much would they be worth? Would they be worth anything? Would anybody hav any right to infer that Mr Carnegie ever intended to redeem them? And if Mr. Carnegie could make these bills worth a dollar each by simply printing "one dollar" on them, could not every farmer or other person who owns any property do the same thing? I mean, of course, in proportion to his means.

The wealth of the United States is ample security for a number of large bills—a greater number than I should need, after settling home accounts and paying for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its valuable assortment of books, I assure you—but how are you going to bind this property to pay the debt without any promis to pay? All other notes are held invalid if they contain no promis to pay; and if the paper money now circulating, which contains a promis to pay, is not good enough for you, how are you going to make it better by obliterating the security and relying on an implied promis?

The reason why gold and silver circulate at par without any promis to pay is, that the world recognize them as money, while the world does not recognize any kind of paper with any variety of words printed on it as money. Whenever any nation refuses to accept either of these metals as money, the relativ value of that metal as money depreciates in proportion to the commercial influence of the nation which demonetizes it. The value of gold and silver depends upon the demand for them for both scientific and monetary uses; and therefore, if the world were to employ substitutes for them in the arts and sciences, that proportion of these metals now so used would be coined as money, and its relativ value to the commodities of the world would be lessened. That is to say, you could buy more gold and silver with your other products, and less of other products with your gold and silver.

If fiat paper bills were used as money an act of Congress would be necessary to compel even citizens to receive them. No one else would hav any use for them. Such an act would be equivalent to a promis to receive, and the people would be bound to their payment. Thus every bill would carry with it an implied promis to pay. So it is evident that fiat money in itself cannot possess any more (and manifestly nowhere near as much) value than our present greenbacks, which are simply the government's promissory notes.

Apart from the people, no government ever pays a debt. Government debts are paid by the people composing the government. A paper currency, resting in the hands of all the people, never will or can be presented at once for payment, and therefore governments can maintain a specie basis with a much less amount of coin and bullion in its vaults than that specified on its circulating obligations. Only the ingress of a triumphant anarchy, or great instability of national affairs, could make it necessary to hold dollar for dollar in the United States treasury against outstanding paper indebtedness, and in that case no specie would be likely to exist there, nor would it be needed.

The right to coin money does not confer any authority to make money out of material which can not be coined. Neither does it imply a power to add a money value. A slave is called money because of his value. Branding the word "servant" on his forehead would not enhance the value of his services, although a custom of permitting slavery might do so. Gold is valuable because value has been paid for it in the mines. That which is of no value in itself can only be made to represent value by affixing to it some guarantee that value stands behind it ready to make good its claims.

The printing and distribution of a carload of paper money to each state in the Union might help the debtor to pay, or rather repudiate, his debts on the Wilkins-Micawber plan; it might enable him to add the indorsements of his fellow repudiators to his I. O. U., but it would never help the farmer by increasing the eating capacity of the factory laborer, nor help the manufacturer by adding to the wearing capacity of the farmer. All the money in the world cannot create a want or diminish a demand. All the fiat money that could be printed would not hav made the peach crop sell this year for a gold dollar a bushel, or for anything in the shape of money that would buy what a gold dollar now buys. If you hav what your neighbor wants, you can sell or trade it for value, even if there is no such thing known as money. If everybody raises potatoes there will be nobody to buy potatoes. The way to increase the prosperity of the people is, not to set the printing presses at work manufacturing paper dollars, but to diversify the industries of the people so that there will be no excess of supply or dearth of demand, and so that peaches, corn, and flax-straw shall not be raised to rot on the ground while linen, tin-plate, and a hundred other things are purchased abroad and paid for with money that would keep labor well fed and employed at home and at the same time create a home market for the farmer's surplus products. Another thing that would help to make the country prosperous would be to make the supporters of superstition pay their share of the taxes, and thus lift a part of the burden of taxation off the toiling millions who do not go to church. Here in Hartford a new Catholic God-house of huge dimension is now being built which will cost thousands of dollars and cause unmeasured pollution of the public conscience before old Yaveh sends a windstorm to demolish it, as he did to one of similar character in Bloomington, Ill, in '68 Why will men giv their money and abor for that which is not bread? The fear of hell burns up millions of dollars every year, and the effort to make foreigners swap their superstitions for ours sends millions more abroad. If God be God, et him plead for himself. A. H. DARROW.

The Financial Problem.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 29 h we notice an article from F H. Marsh, of Globe Village, Mass., in which he tersely but shrewdly uncovers the Wall street "hidden hand" that has manipulated our financial system the past quarter century in the interest of money barons. For the people to longer be deceived by the chestnut allusions of the subsidized press to the French assignats, Continental money, and Confederate currency, is unfortunate, to express it mildest. That money is the fiat of government and not the fiat of Jehovah all informed on the subject will concede, except the metallic basis, bull ionaire monopolists, and controlers of the circulating medium. In the interest of themselvs the province of coupon-clippers and mortgage sharks is to purposely mystify and mislead current thought as their only hope of extorting perpetual revenue from the wealth producers of the world.

In economic matters, as in history, astronomy, and the sciences generally, we hav specially strong and assiduous students regarded the world over as authorities, and as against the unsupported intrinsic value ideas promulgated by our money-mongers we below furnish a few quotations gleaned from the ablest sources.

To friends entertaining views counter to these quoted we would suggest that they wrestle with the authorities and not with the obscure Nebraskan below subscribed.

Our ipse dixit would no doubt count but little with those who may notice this communication, and it might be added that unsupported criticism should likewise be regarded.

It [the government] may coin money and regulate its value; may call ten grains of silver a dollar and make it so, or it may coin pot metal into dollars (John Sherman, Secretary Treasury)

A litigant in the supreme court of Iowa, who had loaned gold dollars, objected to receiving greenback dollars in payment He claimed they were not worth as much as the ones he had loaned. The supreme court of Iowa says: "The gold dollar is not a commodity having an intrinsic value, but money having only a statutory value. And every dollar has the same value, without regard to the material" (Baker in Money Monopoly).

The theory of the intrinsic value of money has been abandoned by the best writers and speakers (Encyclopedia Britannica).

Money is a value created by law, a statutory value. The value of metallic money is created by law. Its basis is legal, not material (Henri Cernuchi)

Metallic money, while acting as coin, is identical with paper money in respect to being destitute of intrinsic value (North British Review)

Money is not a substance, but an impression of legal authority, a printed legal decree (United States Supreme Court)

Legally there is no such thing as gold or silver money or paper money. Money is the sovereign authority impressed on that capable of taking and retaining the impression. That upon which the stamp is placed is called coin; the coin may be metal, parchment, or paper. The value is in the stamp, and not in the metal or material (Judge Tiffany's Constitutional Law).

The intrinsic value idea of money was the idea in the day of crude barbarism The simplest and most perfect form of money is that which represents nothing but transferable debt, such as paper It is only when states hav reached a high degree of civilization that they adopt this perfect form of money (Ree's Encyclopedia).

Treasury notes secured by the pledges of the faith and credit of the government with or without interest will make a better currency than gold or silver (Victor Bonnet)

Gold and silver forever fluctuating in their own value can never be made an accurate measure of the value of other commodities (Adam Smith)

An irredeemable paper made a legal tender is universally admitted to be money (John Stuart Mill).

While economists of the Robert Ingersoll type insist that "a paper dollar is a dollar's worth of paper," it would appear their views are not corroborated by accepted authorities on the subject.

Strictly speaking there can be no such thing as an irredeemable currency, since any kind of a dollar is redeemed every time it is given in exchange for a debt, obligation, labor, or its product.

If, as coin-basis advocates assert, money is good only when composed of, or based upon, the specific commodities, gold and silver, why would it not be a better money when based upon the entire wealth and natural resources (gold and silver included) of a solvent government? C. W. TRICE, M.D.

Shall the Columbian Exposition be Opened Sundays?

Yes, certainly, of course it shall; why not?

Some one answers, Because it is God's holy Sabbath and ought to be kept sacred.

It is not and never was set apart by God or his agents as a Sabbath. If Constantine assumed to be God's agent, the people of the nineteenth century do not recognize the authority, and as there is no other, it follows Sunday is not God's holy Sabbath, and has no more claim to be called sacred than the other six days. Then why not keep the Exposition open every day?

Some one else answers, Because this is a Christian country and the people are Christians and they regard Sunday as the Sabbath as they hav a right to do, and being the majority should be allowed to hav their way.

Let us see about these things—of the fifty millions population in these United States (1880 the tables for 1890 are not yet ready), there were less than fifteen million Christians, properly so called, including Catholics, Mormons, and all of the forty-five sects. Instead of being in the majority, the Christians comprise only about three-tenths of the entire population, and that small minority includes a large proportion of the immigrants from the priest-ridden bigoted countries of Europe. By what process of reasoning do three-tenths of the population of the country claim the right and authority to giv it the title of Christian? A truer title would be "Infidel." I think all reasonable and truth-loving people will agree with General Washington that this country is in no sense a Christian country, and for church people to call it so is unwarranted assumption. Our Declaration of Independence, our Constitution and government indicate the character and the true title of the country, and nothing in these savors of Christianity or any other religion, but tolerates any and all forms of religion, but does not prescribe nor require any.

I grant that the Christian people, and all other people, hav the right to regard Sunday, or any other day, as a Sabbath, and keep it in any way they please that does not infringe nor interfere with the rights of others. And no reasonable person will object nor dare to interfere with their full and free exercise of those rights.

If any church or society, organization or individual members, do not approve of continuing the Exposition Sundays, they are not required to attend. They hav an indisputable right to stay away and go where they please; but surely they hav no right to expel others or prevent them from attending. I am not disposed to call names. I take it for granted you are all genial, well-bred gentlemen and ladies, actuated by the Golden Rule; but if you undertake to dictate to others where they shall go or what they shall do on Sunday or any other day, you will be justly liable to be regarded by your fellows as prescriptiv and bigoted (look in your dictionary). Remember, Sunday is not a government institution. Government may rightfully exempt or relieve us from labor on Sunday, if we wish, but cannot rightfully compel us to work, or cease work, on any day.

The wish and intention to attend the great Chicago show in 1892 and 1893 has already become widespread, and will pervade almost everybody when the time comes. Hundreds of thousands, yea millions, will take holidays some time during the continuance of the Exhibition, and a large majority will be working-people, with limited means, who cannot conveniently spare more than one day; and as Sunday is not a working-day they can better afford to visit the Fair on that day than any other. Now, who shall prevent them, and why? None but preachers, bigots, and saloon-keepers hav any real interest in closing the Fair on Sundays. Let us not permit it. B.

The Inevitable Consequence.

From the Jury.

General Grant warned the people of the United States, fifteen years ago, that the aggregation of untaxed property by religious sects had become a danger. Since that time the value of untaxed "church" property—so called in this country—has risen to nearly three thousand million dollars! It is quite needless to ask where this scandalous and infamous abuse will end. Every man with the least bit of gray matter in his mind can see that it means disaster to our posterity. Just so sure as darkness follows daylight, so surely will the continued accumulation of untaxed church property in the United States lead, in the near future, to confiscations at the point of the sword. The amount that could be secured from the annual taxation of church real estate would be sufficient to place every pauper family now starving in the cities of the United States upon the fertil lands of our unoccupied territories.

On the Pacific Coast.

The Special Agency for the Pacific Coast of The Truth Seeker is at 838 Howard street, San Francisco, Cal., where the paper and our publications can be found and subscriptions renewed. Mr. S. P. Putnam, also, will receive subscriptions and renewals.

News and Notes.

Nanaimo is about seventy miles north of Victoria, on Vancouver's island. The way to it is by railroad through a somewhat shaggy and rocky country, where there seems to be little chance for agriculture. Nanaimo is a lively place, with beautiful views about it of land and water. Mount Benson towers up near by. Two thousand miners are employed, and they say there is coal enough to last a hundred years. There are several churches, but the majority of the miners are Liberally inclined. They who deal directly with the earth hav very little occasion for faith in the skies.

I had a most favorable reception. The town hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. I lectured on "Freethought and Morality." There was quite a breezy discussion after it. Two of the audience had taken notes, and the use of the platform was granted them to make objection. They were of the usual style, and did not particularly meet the points of the lecture. It was asserted that the Bible was the source of morality, of civilization, of charity, and so forth. Also that the religion of Jesus was in favor of the workingman. I replied to all these, and especially as to the last point, and proved that Christianity had declared that labor was a punishment and a curse; that Jesus had taught the blessing of poverty, and St. Paul submission to the powers that be; and that the church had never attempted to lift the poor man out of his condition, but only gave him alms; that Jesus had said, "Ye hav the poor always with you," and Cardinal Gibbons had declared that the reason for this was to giv the rich man a chance to exercise his generous feeling. One man must be ground to the dust in order that another might enjoy the luxury of benevolence. A beautiful doctrin indeed. I told my audience that what the poor man wanted was not charity, but justice, and when justice prevailed there would be no need of charity. My opponents were not satisfied with talking once, but wanted each time to hav the last word. I guess they would hav argued all night if we had not enforced parliamentary rules. An opportunity was given for everybody to say his say, once for all. It was then understood that I should close the discussion. Even with this fair understanding according to the rules of debate, after I had finished the former disputants sprang to the floor to make a reply. Well, the discussion set people to thinking, and knots gathered here and there after adjournment and kept up the agitation, while I was taking subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator. The Liberal press will continue the work of the platform. It was an experiment coming to Nanaimo, and it has proved to be a very successful one. Sunday morning William Jensen, Harry Berryman, and Mr. Hawkins, of Victoria, came on the train, and we went over to Wellington, the terminus of the railroad. Nanaimo has a population of five thousand; Wellington a population of one thousand. This also is a mining town, established about ten years ago. At Wellington we were met by Wm. Gordon, who in spite of many difficulties had arranged for two lectures here. It seems that the public hall of the place, built for general purposes, was in constant use by the Christians, and they were not neighborly enough to allow the Freethought party to hav it, even for one day, although the orthodox had it for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. However, Mr. Gordon was not to be defeated. He meant to hav a place—and as luck would hav it, a stable was just being completed, and Gordon secured that and fixed up a neat little hall in the loft. Now, I hav lectured in almost every kind of a place—church, court-house, opera-house, school house, log cabin, store, warehouse, tent, and grove, but this is the first time I ever lectured in a livery stable. Well, Christianity began in a stable, and I guess Freethought can stand it. At any rate, we had fine audiences afternoon and evening and everything went off splendidly.

In front of our place of meeting a stalwart young Christian was distributing bills. I received one. It was headed, "Which Route?" It advertised the "Great Salvation railroad," beautiful scenery, cars first-class. Prince of Light, president, and so on. Then follows the advertisment of the "Ruination railroad." Through dismal swamp, terrific scenery, main depot corner of Unbelief and Disobedience streets, specials from Putnam Park, etc. This is the first time I find myself in the real estate and railroad business. I hope that Putnam Park will prosper and I shall sell a few corner-lots. The bills closed with the announcement, "Attend salvation services at Methodist church. Subject this evening, 'Jehudis's Penknife.' Who is Jehudis and whence the "penknife?"

I lectured at Northfield on Monday night. It rained all day long Monday and other matters intervened so that the school-house in which I lectured was only about half full. Northfield is a mining town, and was started about two years ago and is about as large as Wellington. There are quite a number of Liberals here, and some are added to the list of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

While at Northfield I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. T. R Jones. They are stanch supporters of Freethought. Mrs. Jones's father, William Flewett, has been for years on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He with his wife liv on an island about twelve miles from Nanaimo, and amidst the grandeurs of nature enjoy an independent life. I was sorry not to be able to visit these happy Freethinkers on their island home, but Jones promises to take me there next time. Jones tells me a good story of a little nephew. The truth of the story makes it especially taking. The little boy's father is a member of the church and says grace at the table. But one day in the hurry of business he forgot to say it. The boy looked wonderingly at his father and inquired, "Ain't you going to growl today, pa?" My host is a Welshman and relates this of Evans, a celebrated preacher of Wales, who was asked to preach a sermon in English. In the midst of his elequence, speaking of the lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world, he forgot the English word for lamb and burst out, "The fresh mutton of God that taketh away the sins of the world." The effect, of course, was electric.

Thomas Salmon arranged mainly for the lectures at Northfield. He is an enthusiastic Liberal. T. D. Davis, George Waring, W. G. Monroe, Hugh Monroe, and others I was pleased to meet.

William Gordon, of Wellington, is an old-time worker with Bradlaugh in England. On Sunday afternoon I was at the hospitable table of Mr. and Mrs. William Glover. John Setterington made me a present of a beautiful cane of his own manufacture, which I shall keep and use when I get tired and hav to climb the hills.

E. Hodgson, of Nanaimo, was my right-hand man at this place. His Christian name, Ephraim, is the only thing, he says, that he has kept out of the Bible. I was entertained by himself and wife, who also is of the Liberal fold, although her father is a minister. Mr. Hodgson is about to enter the field with Liberal and scientific lectures. He is a thorough student of phrenology. I am sure that from his standpoint he will giv intelligent discourses. Thomas Hodgson, his brother, Thomas Hardy, D. S. Macdonald, Mr. Campbell, and J. Martell are unflinching co-workers. Mrs Lizzie Kemper, W. K. Keaist, J. H. Pinkerton, L T. Neubert, James Allen, Thomas Salmon, George Waring, and W. G. Monroe join THE TRUTH SEEKER column. J. Black, Charles Capman, P. Gable, and Peter Sabiston enlist under the Investigator flag, and Hugh Monroe takes to the Twentieth Century. The press will follow up the platform in vigorous array.

I am delighted with the outlook in the mining country. I like the people. I would like to hav had two or more meetings at Nanaimo. I should hav been greeted by crowded houses. But time forbade. I was obliged to leave on Tuesday morning. I hope, however, to see this place again and its stalwart Liberals.

Victoria is in gala dress when I return. The firemen's tournament is the attraction and the Nanaimo boys win the first prize of $500. It is a brilliant and exciting contest. The race is superb. The Nanaimo team win only by half a second.

At the Occidental Hotel I find the same jovial welcome.

The Victoria Liberals are about to make a forward movement and secure for a few months the services of Mrs. Krekel or some other to organize and concentrate the Freethought element.

I am now (Thursday, October 1st) in the land of Snohomish, Snykomish, Stillaguamish, and other "mishes" too numerous to mention. I am in the sanctum sanctorum of G. E M., the man with the badge pin, George E Macdonald, who is now editor of the Snohomish Eye, who likes this frontier life where so much is going on.

The Snohomish Eye is the official paper of the city and the oldest paper in the county. It is a live, liberal, progressiv, fearless, and independent journal. C. H. Packard, the proprietor, is a man who can't be bought. He established the paper and it is always perfectly reliable. It tells the news without fear or favor. With Packard and Macdonald combining forces the Eye flashes brightly and is widely quoted by the secular press.

Macdonald admires this go-ahead country and people. There is always something to interest. The streets of this little metropolis present an ever-varying panorama. I am glad to say that the baby is growing, wears the Freethought badge-pin, and every way presents a fine Infidel aspect. He takes after his father, I think. The house on the river floats gaily along the tide, and around the hospitable table of Mr. and Mrs. Martin we gather. Snohomish always givs a cordial welcome.

The local academy of the place has an exhibition on hand at the opera house, and by mutual consent the lecture is adjourned from Wednesday to Thursday evening. The exhibition consists of "The Daestrict Skule" of fifty years ago, participated in by about twenty of the scholars, under charge of the Rev. Dorrena and his assistant, Prof. Edward Morse, whose literary and elocutionary abilities are well known. We all went to the "skule" provided with peanuts and candy, and by vigorous efforts secured front seats. The drama of the olden time was well rendered, and the school-children did themselvs credit and the older folks too.

The lecture on Thursday evening was well attended. The subject was "Religious Insanities—Moody, Sam Jones, etc." The audience listened to the points made as if they accepted them. However, there was some opposition. I was interrupted in the midst of my discourse with denials. I offered free discussion at the close of the lecture. A gentleman, a Catholic, occupied the platform about forty-five minutes. He said he was a "sort" of a Christian, and evidently he was, for he said that Jesus did not originate Christianity, but that it existed from the time of Adam and Eve. Jesus was only a "phase" of Christianity, not its founder. My critic was not very well informed in scripture, for he asserted that God made the sun and moon to stand still in order that Joshua might walk through the Red sea. In regard to Jonah in the whale's belly, he remarked that undoubtedly in that condition—such straitened circumstances—Jonah needed some "outside support"—a father-in-law, I suppose. He said that prisons were needed. I showed by statistics that prisons were needed for Christians, not for Infidels. The Christians fill the jails. The debate was evidently enjoyed by all present, and I am glad that my opponent had the courage of his convictions. He is bolder than all the clergymen put together. He is a real estate agent. Perhaps that accounts for his cheek and his capacity of trying to make "the worse appear the better reason." He boomed Christianity about as he would a corner-lot.

However, he talked pretty well, and I hope he will be as ready to debate the next time. It adds to the interest when both sides are presented.

I leave Snohomish on Friday morning.

I hav a few hours in Seattle, and meet friends Wilson, Amunds, Captain May, and others. Charles F. Blackburn is at the Grand Hotel, with his wife and mother and sisters, and the new baby just five weeks old—a wise looking child, and I do not think he will ever know what orthodoxy is. Long life and happiness to the son of the first vice president of the Oregon Secular Union. I am sorry that he can not be present at the Portland convention.

The Seattle Secular Union are about to build a hall of their own, and establish themselvs upon a permanent basis. The prospects here are good.

Seattle, Oct. 2 1891. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Oregon State Secular Union Convention.

The Oregon state Secular Union convention was called to order on Saturday morning at 10 o'clock by Judge C. Beal, known as the father of Oregon Liberalism. Adele Cochran began the exercises with a piano solo. The audience then joined in singing "America." Indisposition preventing Mrs. Asenath Cochran from delivering the opening speech as announced in the program, Judge H. N. Maguire, being on the floor, complied with the request to take Mrs. Cochran's place.

Judge Maguire, briefly glancing over the field of history, reached the general conclusion that the race had been steadily advancing, morally and intellectually, with correspondingly improving environments, down to that most fruitful of historical events, the American Revolution, notwithstanding periodical reactions to worse conditions. The reactions had always been followed by greater advances. The state can never rise above the average intelligence and morality of the people constituting it.

Professor Seymour followed with remarks on the necessity of the education of humanity, the establishment of science, and the overthrow of the Gods. Mr. Witherspoon spoke of the spirit which lies behind all the religious ceremonies of the past—the spirit of personal aggrandizement. We must, said the speaker, not only destroy the religious superstitions, but also the economic superstitions which are in the way of human progress. Addresses were made by B. F. Hyland, Mrs. Keenan, Mr. Priestley, Judge Handley, Mrs. Olds, Mr. Rohabacher, Mr. Cochran, and Mr. Henry Addis. The practical work of the Secular Union was the subject of discussion.

The afternoon session was opened with music by Adele Cochran and Olea Cochran. Olea is only six years of age and is a skilful player upon the violin. The little musicians were heartily applauded by the audience.

Dr. Boynton then gave an original poem upon science and theology, and pictured in glowing colors the march of improvement. Adele and Olea followed with a beautiful piano duet.

A letter was read from Katie Kehm Smith inculcating the best methods of work. She wrote:

"Times hav changed. The present generation is not satisfied with the old-time sermon. It demands something abreast of the age—something new, something practical. It demands speakers who can awaken thought and spur to action. Of all times propitious for us could any be more so than the present?" The writer favored a closer organization of Liberals—that there should be a central society, that circuits should be established and regular lecturers employed, and that to a certain extent we should employ the methods of the church, which as business methods hav been preëminently successful.

After the reading of the letter Miss Parish sang with fine effect the song, "A Thousand Years, My Own Columbia." The audience joined in the chorus. A committee on resolutions was appointed—Mr. Henry Addis, Mrs. Keenan, Mrs. Sarah C. Todd, Mr. Priestley, Mrs. Olds, and B F. Hyland.

A breezy discussion then took place on the ideas advanced in the letter of Katie Kehm Smith. Mr. Addis criticised it. He did not want anything like a church. Mrs. Dunning thought that a Secular church would be a good thing. Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Priestley, Professor Seymour, Mrs. Keenan, and Mrs. Olds spoke in favor of a better organization, but did not desire that any kind of a central authority should be established.

Saturday evening a large audience was present. Mr. Beal opened the meeting with an enthusiastic address on the future work of the Union. He expressed unbounded faith in the triumph of Secularism. Mr. Putnam spoke on "The Demands of Liberalism." The meeting was enlivened by renditions on the piano by Adele and Olea Cochran. Some of Adele's best executions were improvised upon subjects given her by the audience.

SUNDAY MEETINGS.

The convention was called to order Sunday morning at 10 o'clock by President Beal. Music by Adele and Olea Cochran. The question of raising funds was then discussed. Remarks upon this point were made by Mrs. Sarah C. Todd Judge McGuire, B F. Hyland, S P. Putnam, Mr. Rohabacher, Henry Addis. J. W. Cochran, Mr. Hendee, D. C. Stewart, M. S. Liden, and R. E Short. A resolution was adopted by the convention to raise $500 for the work of the ensuing year. Judge Handley, of Tillamook, then gave an address on "Church Taxation." He said:

The preachers and those who are supported out of investments of church funds demand and receive the same protection as others. When a missionary in China or Turkey gets in trouble by talking of Budha and Confucius as no one here would be allowed to speak of God and Moses, he immediately says. "I am an American citizen." At those magic words, our fleet, our property, and our citizens' lives are all freely offered to protect, not a Catholic, not a Protestant, or a Freethinker, but unhesitatingly to rescue any one of any creed or belief who appeals to the stars and stripes. Excepting our Mexican war, every foreign entanglement, every dollar of expense our government has had, sprang from the dangers and distresses of missionaries, whose property has paid no share of the expense. If all the church property had been taxed from the beginning of our government until now it would not pay the cost of protecting missionaries in forcing themselvs upon other countries when they were not welcome, but they say that their property must not be taxed because it is devoted to the service of the Lord. It is used to support the servants of the Lord. They go to the heathen in the name of the Lord and get into trouble on his account, and then they call on Uncle Sam to help them out at the expense of other people. This is neither good sense, good morals, good economy, nor good public policy. Let every man who is benefited by the public funds pay his share toward that fund and then we will hav the uniform taxation that our forefathers deemed a vital principle of free government.

Sunday afternoon an excellent address was made by Elder Sharp of the Seventh Day Advent church. He planted himself fairly and squarely upon the platform of religious liberty, or rather personal liberty, for, said he, one has just as good a right to be non-religious as to be religious. The right to worship God involves the equal right not to worship God. The speaker pointed out the dangers ahead, not only in ecclesiastical legislation, but also in the decisions of the courts. He especially referred to the recent decision in the case of Mr. King, whose appeal to the supreme court of the United States as an American citizen was rejected on the ground that the state had the power to pass an unjust law and violate the rights of the minority, and there was no remedy. A more astounding decision was never made. What is the use of a general government if it cannot protect the citizen from injustice? Elder Sharp received a warm welcome from the audience, and the coöperation of these Christian allies is especially valuable. The speaker closed with an eloquent plea for justice and for greater efforts by the friends of liberty to maintain the principles of a secular government. A round of applause greeted our Christian coadjutor.

A committee was appointed to consider the amount due Mrs. Krekel, field secretary of the Union, for her services during the past year—Mrs Sarah B. Todd, B F. Hyland, S. P. Putnam, Mrs. M J Olds, Mrs. Carrie B Haight, D. C. Stewart, and M. S. Liden. The convention adjourned until evening.

At the evening session the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, It is self evident that the tendency of the times is to the concentration of the wealth of the country in a few hands, thereby robbing and impoverishing the masses of the people.

Resolved, That the sympathy of this convention is with all societies whose objects are the elevation and advancement of the working people. The power of the government can not be made conducive to the success of these measures until the ecclesiastical usurpations in the state are successfully resisted and civil and religious liberty secured to all.

Resolved, That this convention urges upon all Liberals the importance of organizing local societies for the purpose of disseminating Secular principles, involving natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

Resolved, That, while this convention recognizes the importance of working for all the demands of state secularization, it would advise that special efforts be made to secure the taxation of church property, and instructs the board of directors to provide from the funds of the Union petitions to be circulated among the people of Oregon for their signatures, asking the legislature of Oregon to repeal the law exempting church property from taxation.

WHEREAS, We hav invited the whole world, Christian, Jew, and pagan alike, to our Columbian Exposition, and,

WHEREAS, There are millions of people whose duties will prevent their attending the Exposition on any day except Sunday.

Resolved, That we enter our most earnest protest against the attempt to close the World's Fair on Sunday.

Resolved, That, as members of the Oregon Secular Union. we will do all in our power to elect men to the legislature of Oregon in 1892 pledged to work for the repeal of all Sunday laws and for the enactment of laws making church property pay its just share of tax.

Resolved, That we deprecate war and favor arbitration as a means of settling all national and international questions of dispute.

Resolved, That we urge the Liberals everywhere, by all means and in all places possible, to establish and maintain free reading-rooms and libraries.

Resolved, That we recognize in woman the equal and companion of man, and entitled to all the privileges accorded to man in public life as well as at home. The established church has ever been the enslaver of woman, therefore we call upon all liberty-loving women to forsake their allegiance to this institution, and work with those who work for them.

After the adoption of the resolutions, remarks were made by Mrs. Dumway and Henry Addis as to the work of Secularism by means of the press and its relations to the great moral and industrial reforms of the day. The closing address of the convention was made by Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, on the subject of Secular services in honor of our dead. It was a plea against the darkness and terror which orthodoxy flings about the grave in order to perpetuate its tyranny. Death is as natural as birth, and we should not fear it. If half the efforts which orthodoxy has devoted to making death horrible had been given to making fairer and better births for humanity, the suffering and despair of to-day would not hav existed. We work for life and not for death. Death will come, but we will meet it in the light of science, in the beauty of human faith and hope in sympathy with one another, and not in the dread and fear of the religion of the Dark Ages.

A collection was taken up at the close of the lecture, and $5 for the treasury was the result. The audience was one of the largest that ever attended a Secular meeting

MONDAY'S SESSION.

The convention was called to order by President Beal. A letter was read from Mr. Ravelin, of California, regretting that he could not be with the convention and giving it his heartiest support.

SYNOPSIS OF FIELD SECRETARY'S REPORT.

Commenced activ work May 11th. Delivered during following five months eighty-one lectures;

Receiving therefrom	$588 00
Expenses for same time	372 00
Received from society for distribution of pamphlets	50 00
Expended	25 00
Returned to society	25 00
Secretary's fund pledged and paid	30 00

SYNOPSIS OF TREASURER'S REPORT.

Money received up to close of convention, including that already in the treasury	338 00
This sum does not include the subscriptions hereafter reported by the secretary.
Expenses of convention	171 00

A committee on nomination of officers was appointed: Mrs. Krekel, S P. Putnam, Mrs. S. C. Todd, D C. Stewart, B. F. Hyland, J. K. Sears, and W. W. West.

The committee on salary of field secretary reported the following:

The committee recommend that the Oregon state Secular Union pay to its field secretary, Mrs. Mattie P Krekel, in addition to what has already been contributed for her services, the sum of $250 out of its funds, deeming this a just debt to Mrs. Krekel for her work during the past year in behalf of the Union.

The resolution was unanimously passed and the treasurer authorized to pay the amount.

A resolution was offered and carried, that S. P. Putnam be paid $25 for his services.

A resolution was carried expressing the thanks of the convention to Henry Weinbart for his generous contribution of $75 to the expenses of the second annual convention. Also to Dr Boynton for his excellent poem, and to Elder Sharp for his cheerful aid given to the convention and for his courageous address Also to Adele and Olea Cochran for their kindness in furnishing music. The convention fully appreciated their brilliant gifts, which are used in behalf of Universal Mental Liberty.

The following resolutions were passed unanimously:

Resolved, That in the death of Mrs. Carrie E. Fitzgerald, of Silverton; Mr. Ordway, of Portland; Dr. Hendricks, of Albina; C. Rodgers, of Prineville; Judge Doud, of East Portland, the Secular cause has suffered a great loss. These hav been true Liberals, earnest workers for humanity and freedom, and they will always be held in grateful remembrance. And this convention hereby extends to the families and friends of our departed comrades their most cordial sympathy.

Resolved, That whereas personal liberty is grounded in the liberty of thought and speech; and whereas, influences of early training often cloud the mind to right reason; and whereas, in our judgment a knowledge of natural laws is the best safeguard youths can hav against sophistry and superstition, it is the sense of this congress that all members of the Secular Union of Oregon should use their influence in putting scientific text-books into public schools and libraries, and natural law primers into the hands of their children.

Resolved, That this convention recognizes the right of the freedom of the press, and condemns all attempts to exercise ecclesiastical censorship of the mails.

Resolved. That while it is not the object or mission of the Oregon Secular Union to advocate special or partisan efforts, but to call forth and giv respectful consideration to all shades of opinion regarding matters of public interest, we deem it proper to declare our confidence and hope in the peaceable solution of the great economic questions now agitating the public mind in both hemispheres.

The following were elected officers for the coming year:

PRESIDENT, J. Henry Schroder, Coos Co.
SECRETARY, Mrs. Sarah C. Todd, Washington Co.
TREASURER, Reuben Wright, Clackamas Co.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

D. C Stewart, Wash. Co.	Lee Laughlin, Yamhill Co.

Mrs Elvia Davidson Blackburn, North Bend, Wash.	Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, Port Townsend, Wash.

Mr. Beal declined re-election. By a standing vote Mr. Beal and Mrs. Krekel were thanked by the whole convention for their noble services. It was decided not to elect a field secretary or assistant secretary. The list of vice-presidents was revised, one to be appointed from each county. The secretary was authorized to fill the list by counties when she found those who were willing to work.

In addition to the fund contributed for use during the session of the convention the following amounts were subscribed by the friends whose names are written below for the $500 fund:

Cornelius Beal, Cathlamet, Wash	$25 00
Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Rohabacher, Terrace Place, Ore	25 00
R. Rosenthal, Portland, Ore	10 00
W. W. Glenn	10 00
R. C. Snodgrass, Eugene, Ore	2 00
Chas. E. Pease, Clackamas, Ore	5 00
Morton Miller, Dayton, Ore	5 00
C. D Priestly, Milwaukee, Ore	5 00
John Price, Scappoose, Ore	5 00
P. L. Spencer, Beaverton, Ore	2 50
A. K Olds, McMinnville, Ore	5 00
Mrs. M. J Olds, McMinnville, Ore	5 00
T. G. Todd, Forest Grove, Ore	10 00
Sarah C. Todd, Forest Grove, Ore	5 00
L P. Howard, Camby, Ore	2 50
F Parker, Petaloma, Cal	1 00
G. H. Briggs, Portland, Ore	1 00
B F. Hyland, Corvallis, Ore	5 00
D C Stewart, Forest Grove, Ore	10 00
W. W. West, Scappoose, Ore	10 00
D. Priestly, Milwaukee, Ore	5 00

These are subscriptions for the $500 fund to be raised for future work. Most of them are pledges; the money to be paid any time during the year. The secretary is ready to receive further subscription from all Oregon Liberals and will report from time to time in THE TRUTH SEEKER. And it is to be sincerely hoped that all Liberals will generously respond.

Lectures and Meetings.

S. P. PUTNAM'S lecture appointments for October are as follows: San Francisco, October 11th; Sacramento, 18th. Will lecture in California through the months of October, November, December, and January, state convention January 29th.

OCTOBER 16th at the Liberal Club Dr. Robert A. Gunn will reveal "The Democratic Situation" to the inquiring audience. The week following Wilson Macdonald will outline "The Republican Issues," and one week thereafter, just before election day, Robert Blissert will talk about "The People's Party."

J. E REMSBURG has just closed a four nights' debate at Louisville, Neb., with Rev. D R. Dungan, president of Cottern University. President Dungan has debated with B. F. Underwood, W. F. Jamieson, and others, and is regarded as the leading champion of the Campbellite church in the West. It is the verdict of nearly all who attended the Louisville debate, excepting a few zealous Christians, that Mr. Dungan was thoroughly defeated.

The Gospel According to John.

II.

18. Again Jesus returned to Galilee, where, after curing some diseases, he miraculously fed five thousand people with five loaves and two small fishes. This is the only miracle recorded by all four evangelists. The effect of it was such, according to John, that Jesus, "perceiving that the multitude would take him by force to make him king, departed again into a mountain himself alone." But the other gospels say that he went into the mountain to pray. In the reign of Queen Alexandra (78–69 B C), when Jesus was stoned and hanged, it might hav been possible to establish a new monarchy, but in the year 32 A D. the country of the Jews was ruled by two tetrarchs and a procurator appointed by the Roman government.

19 On the day following this miracle Jesus addressed a crowd at Capernaum, saying:

I am the bread of life, he that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst. . . . I came down from heaven not to do mine own will but the will of him that sent me. . . . And this is th will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may hav everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day.

At this the Jews murmured and said: "Is not this the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How is it then that he saith, I come down from heaven."

Evidently they believed that he had a human father, nor did he himself deny it. But how could they reconcile his human with his divine parentage? Nor could he himself make it intelligible, for he went on repeating his former words and saying:

I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall liv for ever. And the bread that I will giv is my flesh, which I will giv for the life of the world. . . . Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye hav no life in you.

No wonder that the writer adds: "From that time many of his disciples went back and walked no more with him." Then Jesus said to the twelve: "Will ye also go away?" And Simon Kepha answered: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art the Meshiha, the Son of the living God." But Jesus said: "Hav not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?"

This early foreknowledge of his betrayal by Judas is disclosed only in the fourth gospel.

20 "After these things," says John, "Jesus walked in Galilee; for he would not walk in Jewry because the Jews sought to kill him." But the feast of the Tabernacles being at hand his brethren (who, strange to say, did not believe in him) urged him to go up to Jerusalem and there perform his miracles. But Jesus said to them: "Go ye up unto the feast; I go not up yet, for my time is not yet full come." So his brethren went, and soon afterward Jesus also went, but "as it were, in secret." Inquiry was made for him at Jerusalem, but "no man spake openly of him for fear of the Jews." In the midst of the feast Jesus appeared in the temple and taught. "How knoweth this man lettere," said the Jews, "having never learned?" Jesus answered them saying:

My doctrin is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrin, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself. He that speaketh of himself seeketh his own glory; but he that seeketh his glory that sent him, the same is true, and no unrighteousness is in him. Did not Moses giv you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill me?

What wonder that the people answered: "Thou hast a devil. Who goeth about to kill thee?"

Jesus continued his incoherent and insane harang. "They sought to take him," says John, "but no man laid hands on him, because his hour was not yet come." Officers were sent to take him, but failed to do it, and he continued to talk. Again on the last and great day of the feast he declaimed in the temple. Some said: "He is the Meshiha." Others said: "Doth Meshiha come from Galilee? Doth not the Scriptures say that Meshiha cometh of the seed of David, and from Bethlehem, the town of David?"

The officers sent to arrest him were afraid to do it, and returning without their prisoner said: "Never did a man speak as this man speaketh." "Are ye also deceived?" said the Pharisees. "Hav any of the chiefs, or of the Pharisees, believed in him?" But Nicodemus, who had met Jesus secretly by night, interposed and said: "Doth our law condemn a man unless it first hear him?" To this reasonable question their answer was: "Art thou also from Galilee? Search and see that no prophet ariseth from Galilee."

21. Having thus escaped arrest Jesus went to the Mount of Olives, and as he was speaking to the people there the Scribes and Pharisees brought to him a woman caught in adultery. It is needless to repeat this story, which is told only by John, and which is wanting in the earliest codices of the New Testament, namely, the Vatican, the Sinaitic, and the Syriac. Furthermore, if you omit the whole story the narrativ of the fourth gospel is not at all interrupted, showing that this part is an evident interpolation.

22 Jesus continued his declamation in the temple. The Pharisees said: "Thou bearest record of thyself; thy record is not true." Jesus answered: "Though I bear record of myself yet my record is true."

How can this statement be reconciled with a previous one, to wit: "If I bear witness of myself my witness is not true" (v, 31)?

Some further extracts from this speech of Jesus as reported by John are worthy of note, as follows:

For I know whence I came and whither I go, but ye can not tell whence I came and whither I go. Ye judge after the flesh; I judge no man. And yet if I judge, my judgment is true. . . . I am one that bear witness of myself, and the father that sent me beareth witness of me. . . . I go my way, and ye shall seek me and shall die in your sins Whither I go ye cannot come. Ye are from beneath, I am from above. . . . Ye seek to kill me because my word hath no place in you. . . . Ye are of your father the devil. . . . He was a murderer from the beginning. . . . When he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own; for he is a liar and the father of it. . . . It is my Father that honoreth me; of whom ye say that he is your God. Yet ye hav not known him, and if I should say I know him not, I shall be a liar like unto you, but I know him and keep his saying. Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it and was glad.

"Thou art not yet fifty years old," said the Jews, "and hast thou seen Abraham?"

The ready reply of the Logos was: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was I am."

The bad grammar is in the Greek version; the Syriac reads: "Before Abraham existed I was."

The angry Jews then took up stones to cast at Jesus, but he retreated and hid himself and so escaped their fury.

23 Going away from the temple Jesus saw a man who was blind from his birth. His disciples asked him: "Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" Jesus answered: "Neither this man nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him." Whereupon Jesus spat on the ground and made clay of the spittle which he spread upon the blind man's eyes and said: "Go wash in the pool of Siloam." The man went and washed and was restored to sight.

The Greek version interpolates after Siloam, "which signifies having been sent."

This faith cure is narrated only by John, who tells us that it caused a great disturbance, especially as it happened on the Sabbath day. The Pharisees pestered the blind man and his parents about it. The parents prudently declined to answer, fearing they might be put out of the synagog for confessing that Jesus was the Meshiha. They said their son was of age and should speak for himself. The son grew irritable saying: "I hav told you already and ye did not hear. Wherefore would ye hear it again? Will ye also be his disciples?" Then they reviled him and he retorted, saying: "Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that had been born blind. If this man was not of God he could do nothing." This was enough, "and they cast him out," i.e., excommunicated him.

Jesus hearing of this went to the man and said: "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" "Who is he, Lord, that I might believe?" replied the poor man. "It is he that talketh with thee," said Jesus. "Lord, I believe," said the man, and he worshiped him.

24. To the Pharisees who were about him at this time Jesus spoke a parable about the shepherd, the sheep, and the sheepfold. But as they could not understand the meaning of it, he explained, saying:

I am the door of the sheep. All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers. . . . I am the good shepherd and know my sheep and am known of mine. . . . And other sheep I hav which are not of this fold. Them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one shepherd. Therefore doth the father love me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again. . . . I hav power to lay it down and I hav power to take it again.

Many of the Jews hearing this said: "He hath a devil and is mad." Others said, "Can a devil open the eyes of the blind?" And there was a division among them.

25 Again at the feast of the dedication of the temple, in the winter, the Jews gathered around Jesus in Solomon's porch and said: "How long dost thou make us doubt? If thou be the Meshiha, tell us plainly." His answer was:

I told you and ye believed not. The works that I do in my father's name, they bear witness of me. But ye believe not because ye are not of my sheep. . . . I and my father are one.

Then the Jews threatened to stone him for blasphemy, making himself God. But Jesus qualified his words, saying:

Is it not written in your law "I said ye are Gods?" (Psalms lxxxii, 6) If he (David) called them Gods unto whom the word of God came and the scriptures cannot be broken, say ye of him whom the father hath sanctified and sent into the world, "Thou blasphemest," because I said I am the son of God? If I do not the works of my father, believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works, that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me and I in him.

Unconvinced by this weak and false argument they sought again to kill him. But again he escaped and went to the other side of Jordan where John at first baptized, and there he abode. The reference here is to chapter i, verse 28

These things were done in Bethabara, beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing.

Bethabara is supposed to be identical with Bethbarah, an ancient ford of Jordan. But unfortunately the oldest Greek MSS., as well as the ancient Syriac and the Latin Vulgate, hav Bethany, which was twenty miles this side of Jordan, and within two miles of Jerusalem! ANTICHRIST.

Letters to Workingmen.

MONEY.

In former letters I sought to establish the fact that government was a superstition. By showing the method of its origin and evolution I now propose to speak of the various functions of government and endeavor to show that superstition breeds superstition. Perhaps the most important function of government—the one most affecting the weal or woe of the people—is the coining of bullion and dictating the bases of all issue of paper money. Chambers' Encyclopedia says, "The power which controls the qualities or quantities of money, whether of coin or paper, strikes at once every material interest of every citizen of the country which is subject to it." And I want you to observe closely what it says further on: "A small number of the whole people, those whose business it is to deal in money as lenders or bankers, alone keep that close watch of legislation which enables them to control it unduly so as to promote their own interests." And when we consider the fact that money is to trade and commerce what the blood is to the living organism and should be allowed to circulate as freely, we see what a tremendous power for evil to the many is in the hands of an insignificant few. We know that a scarcity of money always affects disastrously the interests of industry and is a direct benefit to the lend lord, and it does not take any very astute intelligence to be aware of the fact that the bankers and gamblers of Wall street manipulate the financial policy of the nation, and as long as money is a creature of law, a child of the state, we may expect such policy as will benefit the lords of finance. What is money? When we consider the various answers by the various schools of thought we find the same trouble appears that we noticed to that other question, What is government? Our hard-money friends tell us that coined metal alone is money, that paper money is merely a promis to pay the coin. That the money property is in the gold. That government cannot make money, it simply coins it. That it puts it in shape for the accommodation of the people and reserves the right to do this to protect the public from counterfeiters. While our soft-money friends hold that the money property is given to coin by the government. That government not only coins the bullion, but makes it money and can unmake it at will as in the case of the trade dollar. That money may be based upon the wealth of the nation as it is now based upon gold and issued as irredeemable paper currency. From the standpoint of the governmentalist the soft-money theory is sound. The trouble is that when put to the test the god of government does not pan out any better than the god of theology. Our soft-money friends display no greater superstition, however, than our hard money friends. We may as well make a god of government as a god of gold. So long as the government monopolizes the issue of money and insists upon basing that issue upon gold, which is ridiculously inadequate to represent the money required to do business with, it must of necessity partake largely of a fiat nature and be subject to inflation and contraction. And so long as inflation produces activity, as increasing the amount of circulation always does, and contraction or lessening the circulation produces stagnation, as it invariably does, so long will the idea grow that the evil results from basing the issue upon gold, and so long as the idea remains that money to be money must bear the stamp of government, so long will the fiat idea continue. Of the two systems I am inclined to think the worst is really the best. The fiat idea is a logical conclusion from the government idea as that is of the God idea, and an issue of irredeemable currency would demonstrate the impotency and show the absurdity of the whole government machinery. It is not my intention to discuss the various ideas of finance but to confine myself to the question what is money, and to show that our ideas are largely dominated by the superstition that government can do things that the people cannot. In the beginning of trade it was early discovered that a token of value might be taken in lieu of commodities, which could be easily exchanged for articles desired. These tokens, which constituted the first money, were undoubtedly composed of the ornaments of the primitiv people. Such people always regard ornaments of the utmost importance, and parted with them at first, I may suppose, as a sort of pledge to be redeemed. The practice soon established such trinkets as currency. When agriculture began and the real value of commodities became more apparent "flocks and herds" became the money of the people, while with the hunters hides and furs were used in traffic. As civilization grew gold and silver and precious stones, from their great beauty and value as ornaments, became the medium of exchange. As the robber chief evolved into the governor of state gold, silver, and inferior metals were rudely shaped and stamped into coin and their value fixed. Then it was that the definition of Aristotle was at least three-quarters true. He said money is a measure of value, a medium of exchange; an invention of man and a creature of law. As an invention of man and a medium of exchange it began before governments and will continue when governments shall hav passed away. As a creature of law it became the tool of a rapacious monopoly. Originally a harmless and useful invention of man, it has become a veritable "club of civilization," and with good reason stigmatized as the "root of all evil." What has wrought the change? I tell you, friends, it is the government, which has adopted it and deformed it to its own ugly proportions. As "a measure of value" it is a delusion, unless we mean to convey the idea of a unit of value arranged into a scale whereby we may express the value of commodities. As value can be determined only in relation to other things, it follows that money can be no measure or standard of value. What they mean is that gold having its value fixed by law—so many grains to a dollar—money is the standard or measure of gold. And as gold was about the only value in their eyes, they came to use the expression "measure or standard of value." Why gold should be thus favored is the mystery which furnishes the superstition of money. Yet the mystery is explained when we consider the fact that gold was early monopolized by a class that has ever manipulated the governing power. And in fixing the value of gold and making it the only basis for the issue of money which alone is declared to be a legal tender or debt-paying property, they hav a lien upon the world's wealth and hav been enabled to enslave labor. Our money is regulated by financiers as our laws are made by lawyers. And as I hav shown in former essays, man's inherent selfishness has ever evolved systems whereby he and his class shall hav special advantages. A correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER speaks of "money and the mechanism of exchange" as being "a science with principles just as fixed and definit as the rules of arithmetic." I believe that true economy may be based upon principles as undeviating as the "rules of arithmetic," but those principles will never be accepted by that power which depends upon its "thus be it enacted." Men talk of the "science of politics" and the "science of theology," but the man is stark mad who would think of applying the rules of arithmetic in solving any of its intricate problems. Government to be government must not be bound by any principles recognized by the individual, even as God to be God must be above the laws of nature. When men are no longer dazed by the "glittering generalities" and special pleading of politicians and study the facts which underlie true economy they will perceive that the principle which makes money a necessity is a value or promis of value to facilitate exchange. It may be gold or silver or other metals coined in a scale of valuation, or it may be personal notes for value received, due bills, checks, or bills of exchange, or it may be bank notes issued by mutual associations. Money, to serve its true function, should be free, should be of value or a promis of value, always redeemable or interchangeable. I take no stock in "labor money." Labor has no value in itself. Labor is a factor in the production of value. Money should be a value in itself but never a factor in the production of value. The issue of money should be an individual prerogativ. Any man having value and wishing to exchange may issue his promis to pay for goods desired. These promises might be received at local banks and form a basis for the issue of a general circulation. Systems established by mutual interests, for mutual protection, would eliminate fraud and reduce dishonesty to a minimum. I hav not the time, if I had the ability, to enter into the details of a true monetary science, but I believe such a science exists, and I ask you, friends, to think it out; read up mutual banking and a free currency. Let it compete with government money. I know that government may seek to enforce its monopoly, but I know, also, that it is powerless to enforce its prohibitions whenever a large portion of the people quietly adhere to their rights. I ask you to think it out—take into consideration the utility, economy, and effectivness of private enterprise as compared with the impotent, extravagant, and inefficient political institutions.

Fifteenth Annual Congress.

The Fifteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the Board of Directors to meet in Philadelphia, on Saturday morning, Oct. 31, 1891, at 10 o'clock, in Industrial Hall, corner of Broad and Wood streets, for the transaction of business, and to continue over Sunday, November 1st, if the Congress shall so determin. No arrangements will be made for reduced railway or hotel rates.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal right in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution, rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons of whatever faith to its membership on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in its broadest sense, as applied to the state and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Materialists, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, Progressiv Jews, and Liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and Puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platforms and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as upon the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or woman, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

All who work for religious liberty are welcome to the coming Congress of the American Secular Union in the City of Brotherly Love.

Fables and Allegories of the Bible.

[From an address before the Liberal League of Newark, by Sereno E. Todd, Orange, N. J. The following is herewith reproduced:]

Hav you ever been in a lager-beer saloon and heard debauching beer-guzzlers conjure up and tell marvelous and improbable stories, which no one believed to be founded on truth? Well, that story about two thousand devils being cast out of one man, and entering into two thousand swine, causing the entire herd to run violently down a steep place into the sea, where they were all drowned, is just such a marvelous story as one would expect to hear rehearsed by illiterate fishermen. Doubtless you are aware that all the disciples of Jesus were uneducated fishermen. They did not know anything but fish. They believed in witches, spooks, apparitions, and in the accomplishment of any philosophical impossibility. This is one of the stories that they rehearsed for the edification of each other, until they came to think and to believe that the silly falsehood was founded on living and incontrovertible fact. After a person has rehearsed false statements about any person for a few times, he will be ready to declare in positiv language that "he knows the story to be God's truth." Reflect for a moment on the representations. Two thousand devils in one man! and all at once they came out of him and rushed into two thousand swine! What a silly and ludicrous story to teach to children, or to proclaim from the pulpit as the word of the great creator of heaven and earth! All sensible people know there is no devil and never was any. When a person manifests an ugly disposition, that manifestation is personified and denominated the devil. Love is often personified and called God or heaven. Hatred is personified and denominated the devil, or hell. Love and hatred are simply functions, or properties, of vitalized matter. It is too silly and simple to teach such superlativ nonsense to children as God's truth! How infinitly better it would be to teach children how to liv in peace and harmony with each other; how to respect each other's little rights; how to be honest and estimable citizens; how to liv well and happily; and how to make the best use of our time, opportunities, and advantages during our short and hasty career from the cradle to the grave.

Children (and adults also) are taught to believe that Jesus turned water into wine, which was never done, and which is a scientific impossibility. Ask an expert chemist if anyone ever made wine out of water only? He will reply, without any hesitancy, that it cannot be done, and never was done. In the account written about that temperance marriage (in John ii, 3) not one word is recorded to show that the water was turned into wine. Some one told Jesus that there was no wine for the guests to drink. Jesus replied: "Fill the water-pots with water; and they filled them up to the brim. And he saith unto them, draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast; and they bare it." Not one word is said about turning that water into wine. Jesus called it water. The governor of the feast tasted the water and knew it to be water. The language does not state that he tasted wine. The servants who drew the water and bare it to the governor, knew it to be water. The governor perceived the cute scheme to hav a temperance wedding. So when he tasted the water, and saw the joke, he said: "That is good wine." He called it wine, just as little children put water in their cups and call some tea, some coffee, and some milk; and a plate of mud they call custard pie. Jesus was a reformer. He could not turn water into wine any more than any other person. He did not pretend to do any such miracle. But the compilers of the New Testament and the orthodox clergy hav taught and continue to teach this falsehood for truth, that water was turned into wine. This is one of the grave errors of the church, by way of teaching improbabilities, impossibilities, and falsehoods for divine truth.

There are scores of marvelous stories, fables, or allegories in the Bible, which are taught in Sunday-schools, proclaimed from the pulpit, and inculcated in the home-circle, as God's everlasting truth; whereas, the fact is that they are simply marvelous stories conjured up by some illiterate barbarian of one idea, to deceive ignorant people, and keep them in subordination to a scheming priesthood. Contemplate for a moment that fable concerning the sun and moon standing still. I feel chagrined to reflect that untold numbers of excellent people believe that ludicrous story to be God's truth. But no astronomer, geologist, or intelligent geographer, or any well-educated person, will believe that the sun and moon ever stood still. Any person who has only an imperfect comprehension of the earth whirling around the sun many times faster than any rifle bullet ever flew, cannot be induced to believe that the account is anything more than a marvelous story. Our earth whirls along in its orbit more than a thousand miles every minute. Think for a moment of the power necessary to stop such a planet in its course without smashing it all to shattered atoms, like an egg when dashed against a rock! Then reflect on the immense force requisit to start such a world as ours, with all its oceans, continents, mountains, cities, and vast extent of country, and to giv every part a velocity of more than a thousand miles an hour! By trying to interpret the fables and allegories of the Bible literally, we bring out only sacerdotal nonsense. They were written as stories or fables, and we should accept them as stories or allegories, just as we accept John Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" as a sacred allegory.

HISTORY certainly shows that man is less vile than he was once; and, if he has improved, we are warranted in hoping he will "go on unto perfection." The telegraph, the newspaper, and the high moral sentiment which is the standard of society now, bring to notice a multitude of crimes that in old times would not hav gained publicity, both from the lack of facilities for publication and the prevailing lax morality which would hav ignored them. These increased exhibits of sin cause some to mourn over the degeneracy of the times and to sigh for a return of the good old days. If they will read the histories of those days they will find cause for gratitude that they do not date their births any earlier.—Robt. C. Adams.

We hope that whenever a Freethinker sees an article in his local paper in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays he will mark it and send a copy to Benjamin Butterworth, secretary Board of Directors of World's Fair, Rand McNally building, Chicago, Ill., and to John T. Dickinson, secretary National Commission of World's Fair, at the same address. Let us make a vigorous and persistent fight in this matter. Our efforts must not slacken till the final decision is made, which may not be till 1893.

THE Bible Picture Book, we take pleasure in saying, is now under way, and will be issued as soon this fall as the work can be done and done well. The price will be $1, and it will contain a great deal for that amount. In renewing for THE TRUTH SEEKER we hope our readers will not forget to inclose the dollar for it.

Christianity Ruining Industry.

Elliott Shepard, the pious donkey who edits a New York evening paper, recently declared that the famin in Russia has been divinely inflicted in chastisement for persecution of the Jews. The keen-witted Sun bestows upon this notion the smile which it calls for, but proceeds to remark that truth sometimes proceeds from the mouth of babes and sucklings, and fools do not always speak words of folly, even when they do not know what they are saying. For there was a connection between the persecution of the Jews and the extreme famin in Russia, though the connection was neither more nor less providential than any other relation of cause and effect. The Russian farmer, as is known to every reader of Stepniak's book on the Russian peasantry, is always in debt, is always without ready money, and depends altogether for the means to meet his current expenses for labor at seed-time and harvest, on the advances from the money-lenders, who are invariably Jews. These Jewish speculators travel through the country in the spring and purchase the growing crops as they stand, advancing the farmers enough ready money for the expense of harvesting. This year, according to the correspondent of the London Times, the Jews had no money to lend, but were realizing all they could on their own property to take with them across the frontier. As a natural consequence, in whole districts no purchasers appeared in the spring, and the farmers were unable to hire laborers, and only "an infinitesimal portion of the crops" was harvested. That such is the situation in Russia this year is evident enough from the data cited by the Sun; and furthermore, this condition has resulted not merely once but many times, as we know from the letters of E. B. Lanin written before the present year. This traveler through that gloomy Christian land some time ago told us that many of the Russian laws against the Jewish population either defeat their own purpose or inflict considerable loss upon the Christian subjects of the czar. Thus there are numerous districts in Russia—fertil stretches of land—which are in sore need of workmen to till the soil and reap its fruits. It often happens that the corn rots on the ground for want of hands to cut it. The landowners hav been for years crying out for some measure calculated to restore what the emancipation of the serfs deprived them of—cheap labor; and the government did enact a law a few years ago which has created a class of agricultural laborers who sell themselvs for several years, and even descend to the heirs of their master, should he die before the expiration of their term. But this measure has not brought the looked-for relief to Russian landowners, who are often driven to despair at the sight of their riches melting away like snow for want of laborers, while the miserable Jews are perishing of sheer starvation, almost devouring each other, like Ugolino's offspring in the tower of the Gualandi, because there is no work for them to do in the pale.

The Sun goes on to remark upon the evil effect upon industry and prosperity of religious persecution in general, saying:

"The whole intricate social economy of a people cannot be violently and suddenly overturned, no matter how pious or imperativ the reason, without causing vast direct and indirect suffering. Spain never recovered from the expulsion of the Moors. The French race was unquestionably impoverished in an infinit number of ways by the expulsion of the Huguenots. Russia surely will not escape the baleful results of the expulsion of the Jews, and the intense distress of famin is only the precursor of evils possibly more serious still. The result is incomparably more certain than the falling of rain after the explosion of one of Uncle Jerry's kites, but no more than that does it involve any special intervention of divine benevolence or wrath."

That such is one of the many disastrous consequences of religious persecution is indeed true, and was illustrated and deplored by many writers before the Sun commented upon it. That paper speaks of Spain's expulsion of the Moors, but we prefer to call attention to the same country's ejection of the Jews in the fifteenth century. This action affords a close parallel to Russia's present expulsion of the same race, both in its conduct and in its after effects on the expellers. For several centuries Spain had been under the rule of the Mohammedan Moors, and by this people Jews had been treated with the highest consideration. Insulted, hated, plundered, and despised by all Christian nations, banished from England by Edward I. and from France by Charles VI., they flocked from the ignorant and fanatical Christian lands to that country, where flourished the only intellectual culture then existing besides their own. Here the intelligence of the Mohammedans accorded the harassed Jews a ready sympathy and reception. They became distinguished for their wealth and their learning. For the most part they were Aristotelians. They founded many schools and colleges. Their mercantil interests led them to travel all over the world. They particularly studied the science of medicin. Throughout the Middle Ages they were the physicians and bankers of Europe. Of all men they saw the course of human affairs from the most elevated point of view. Among the special sciences they became proficient in mathematics and astronomy; they composed the tables of Alfonso, and were the cause of the voyage of Da Gama. They distinguished themselvs greatly in light literature. From the tenth to the fourteenth century their literature was the first in Europe. They were to be found in the courts of princes as physicians, or as treasurers managing the public finances. But the bright torch of civilization held aloft in the Christian night of Europe before long suffered extinguishment. The Moors were conquered and driven out of Spain by Christians, and with them the Jews lost their only friends. When in this ill-omened hour the cross supplanted the crescent on the hights of the Alhambra, the solitary refuge of the Hebrews was lost, the last gleam of tolerance vanished from Spain, and their expulsion approached.

The orthodox clergy in Navarre excited popular prejudices against them. To escape the persecutions that arose, many of them feigned to turn Christians, and of these many apostatized to their former faith. The papal nuncio at the court of Castile raised a cry for the establishment of the Inquisition. The poorer Jews were accused of sacrificing Christian children at the passover, in mockery of the crucifixion; the richer were denounced as Averroists. Under the influence of Torquemada, a Dominican monk, the confessor of Queen Isabella, that princess solicited a bull from the pope for the establishment of the holy office. A bull was accordingly issued in November, 1478, for the detection and suppression of heresy. In the first year of the operation of the Inquisition, 1481, two thousand victims were burnt in Andalusia; besides these, many thousands were dug up from their graves and burnt; seventeen thousand were fined or imprisoned for life. Whoever of the persecuted race could flee, escaped for his life. Torquemada, now appointed inquisitor-general for Castile and Leon, illustrated his office by his ferocity. Anonymous accusations were received, the accused was not confronted by witnesses, torture was relied on for conviction; it was inflicted in vaults where no one could hear the cries of the tormented. As, in pretended mercy, it was forbidden to inflict torture the second time, with horrible duplicity it was affirmed that the torment had not been completed at first, but had only been suspended out of charity until the following day. The families of the convicted were plunged into irretrievable ruin. Llorente, the historian of the Inquisition, computes that Torquemada and his collaborators, in the course of eighteen years, burnt at the stake ten thousand two hundred and twenty persons, six thousand eight hundred and sixty in effigy, and otherwise punished ninety-seven thousand three hundred and twenty-one. This frantic priest destroyed Hebrew Bibles wherever he could find them, and burnt six thousand volumes of Oriental literature at Salamanca, under an imputation that they inculcated Judaism. With unutterable disgust and indignation we learn that the papal government realized much money by selling to the rich dispensations to secure them from the Inquisition. But all these frightful atrocities proved failures. The conversions were few. Torquemada, therefore, insisted on the immediate banishment of every unbaptized Jew. On March 30, 1492, the edict of expulsion was signed. All unbaptized Jews, of whatever age, sex, or condition, were ordered to leave the realm by the end of the following July. If they revisited it, they should suffer death. They might sell their effects and take the proceeds in merchandise or bills of exchange, but not in gold or silver. Exiled thus suddenly from the land of their birth, the land of their ancestors for hundreds of years, they could not in the glutted market that arose sell what they possessed. Nobody would purchase what could be got for nothing after July. The Spanish clergy occupied themselvs by preaching in the public squares sermons filled with denunciations against their victims, who when the time for expatriation came swarmed in the roads and filled the air with their cry of despair. Even the Spanish onlookers wept at the scene of agony. Torquemada, however, enforced the ordinance that no one should afford them any help. Of the banished persons some made their way into Africa, some into Italy; the latter carried with them to Naples ship-fever, which destroyed not fewer than twenty thousand in that city, and devastated that peninsula; some reached Turkey, a few England. Multitudes, falling into the hands of the pirates who swarmed around the coast, were plundered of all they possessed and reduced to slavery; multitudes died of famin or of plague, or were murdered or tortured with horrible cruelty by the African savages, or were cast back by tempests on the Spanish coast. Weak women, driven from luxurious homes among the orange groves of Seville or Granada, children fresh from their mothers' arms, the aged, the sick, the infirm, perished by thousands. About eighty thousand took refuge in Portugal, relying on the promis of the king; but even there the hatred of the Spaniards pursued them. A mission was organized. Spanish priests lashed the Portuguese into fury, and the king was persuaded to issue an ediet which threw even that of Isabella into the shade. All the adult Jews were banished from Portugal; but first of all their children below the age of fourteen were taken from them to be educated as Christians. Then indeed the cup of bitterness was filled to the brim. The serene fortitude with which the exiled people had borne so many and such grievous calamities gave way, and was replaced by the wildest paroxysms of despair. Piercing shrieks of anguish filled the land.

Women were known to fling their children into deep wells, or to tear them limb from limb, rather than resign them to the Christians. When at last, childless and broken-hearted, they sought to leave the land, they found the ships had been purposely detained, and the allotted time having expired, they were reduced to slavery, and baptized by force. A great peal of rejoicing filled the peninsula, and proclaimed that the triumph of the Spanish priests was complete.

The disastrous effects upon Spain of this expulsion of its most intelligent class were soon felt. The Jews, it is to be remembered, were the most skilful physicians, the ablest financiers, and among the most profound philosophers; while they were only second to the Moors in the cultivation of natural science. They were also the chief interpreters to Western Europe of Arabian learning. But their most important service, and that with which we are now most especially concerned, was in sustaining commercial activity. For centuries they were almost its only representativs. By traveling from land to land till they had become intimately acquainted both with the wants and the productions of each; by practicing money-lending on a large scale and with consummate skill, by keeping up a constant and secret correspondence and organizing a system of exchange that was then unparalleled in Europe, the Jews succeeded in making themselvs almost indispensable to the community, and in accumulating immense wealth and acquiring immense influence in the midst of their sufferings. Spain, deprived of this class, while rival nations in which they had found refuge soon reaped the fruits of the intelligence of the fugitivs, rapidly sank from a brief occupancy of the pinnacle of commercial superiority to the obscurity and stagnation of to-day.

The countries which received the heretics obtained from them an industrial and intellectual stimulus whose effects are yet visible. And this has been the case with all nations which hav followed a like course with refugees from any religious persecution. The commercial genius of the Jewish exiles was one of the elements in the development of Leghorn, Pisa, and Ancona. Amsterdam owes a very large part of its prosperity to the concourse of heretics who had been driven from Bruges and from the surrounding country. The linen manufacture in Ireland, as well as many branches of English industry, were greatly stimulated by the skill and capital of the French refugees. French commerce received a powerful and long-sustained impulse from the good relations Francis I. had established with the Turks. Consequently Amsterdam, and in a less degree the other centers of commercial enterprise, hav been from an early period conspicuous for their tolerance.

We are unwilling to close without introducing a deliverance of the wise Darwin on the results of Spain's persecution not of the Jews alone but of every class possessing sense and the heresy which flows from sense. Investigating why "the Spanish nation, so dominant at one time, has been distanced in the race," the great naturalist calls attention to the fact that during the Dark Ages

"the Holy Inquisition selected with extreme care the freest and boldest men in order to burn or imprison them. In Spain alone some of the best men—those who doubted and questioned, and without doubting there can be no progress—were eliminated during three centuries at the rate of a thousand a year. The evil which the Catholic church has thus effected is incalculable."

What Is Going On Among Catholics.

It is evident that nothing could more weaken the bonds that hold together this Union than the perpetuation among us of the languages, forms, traditions, and sectarian bigotries of the countries from which our immigrants come. Such a continuance of foreign elements might easily become a cause or an aid of disruption in a time of unsettlement and confusion arising either from labor difficulties or from others. Nevertheless an extensiv movement is under way in the Catholic church to encourage such maintenance of diverse alien usages. It takes the name of Cahenslyism, after its originator, Cahensly. This person appealed to Leo XIII. for sanction, and asked that each class here of foreign nativity hav appointed over it prelates from its own land, instead of the regular American ecclesiastics of the district, that they may more fully keep up foreign methods. This notion was and is still hotly opposed by the American Catholic clergy. Of course they hav no care for the weal of the nation, but they are jealous of their own places and influence. The pope declined to favor the design of Cahensly. No doubt European ecclesiastics will urge the scheme, and some observers think that they may prevail upon the pope to indorse it. But we think that there is slight chance of this. The enmity which it would arouse among the regular Catholic clergy of America is one deterrent consideration. Another is the antagonism which the act would kindle in the general population of this country, Protestant and all. Notwithstanding Rome's temerity in openly antagonizing our public schools, it is far from probability that she would giv us so great offense on another head for so inconsiderable a cause.

Cahenslyism nevertheless continues to be pressed by our Western Catholics as if with hope of much effect. The congress of German Catholics just held at Buffalo received from Archbishop Elder of Cincinnati a letter recommending the use of German between German Catholics, and its employment in the inculcation of Christian principles. The exultation of the members of the congress over this letter seemed to be due to the unusual significance attaching to it in their minds as coming from one of the hierarchy not only not a German, but of nativ American birth and ancestry. The congress adopted a platform one paragraph of which reads:

"We demand the full right and liberty to retain, without interference from anyone, our German mother-tongue, together with the language of the country. At the same time we protest most emphatically that for this reason the cry of foreignism is raised against us, and that an attempt is made at denying equal rights with other American citizens."

We may add some of the sentiments of the congress on another matter, the situation of the pope. These German Catholics, like Catholics in all nations, continue firm in the belief that the pope must hav part of Italy's soil given back to him; but we think their notions queer enough, for what has the possession of a piece of ground to do with the proper administering of spiritual institutions which belong to quite another world? Nevertheless, these good servants of "the servant of servants" are fixedly persuaded that

"The entirely free exercise of the highest apostolic power, according to God's ordinance, is intimately connected as well with the welfare of the entire church as with the territorial independence of the holy see, willed by divine Providence. It is the necessary means in our present political and social situation to secure and accord that freedom in its full meaning of the word. Rome, as the natural seat of the papacy, as the centrum of the church, as the metropolis of the Catholic world, belongs to the popes (letter of Leo XIII. to Cardinal Rampolla), who, moreover, used the rights of sovereignty acquired in justice and sealed by solemn contracts, for the welfare of Italy and Europe and the whole world as true benefactors of mankind. . . . With confidence we leave it to Divine Providence by what means the restoration of papal independence will be brought about by secular power. In the mean time we will never cease to courageously sustain the holy father, and, in accordance with his intentions and admonitions, everyone in his own sphere and according to his ability, that right of the head of the church, and to strive with all legal and legitimate means to regain the freedom of the successor of St. Peter."

With confidence they "leave it to Divine Providence by what means the restoration of papal independence will be brought about by secular power." We would suggest that Divine Providence restore to Mr. Pecci his property by divine power. Instead of calling in "secular power," why not entreat Providence into vindicating his vicar's rights by a spiritual host, at which miracle an unbelieving age would indeed hasten back to the fold of faith?

Well Pleased With the Exchange.

A subscriber to the late Freethought writes expressing his opinion of the change. We hope that all the others will agree with him; and he says:

"CLINT, EL PASO COUNTY, TEX., Sept. 27, 1891.

"TRUTH SEEKER Co., New York City: I am now getting THE TRUTH SEEKER in the place of Freethought, and am much pleased with the exchange. Consider me a permanent subscriber and 'may you liv long and prosper.' There are eighty to one hundred thousand so-called reverend clergy in these United States, lazy blood-suckers, making their living out of the ignorance and superstition of the masses. Let us 'turn the rascals out' and force them to some honest work. Inclosed find $2 for a copy of 'The Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book,' which I hope soon to hav the pleasure of receiving through the mail.

"Yours very truly, S. G. ETHERIDGE."

Editorial Notes.

MOSES HARMAN expects to be put on trial again at the November term of court. It would be a wise thing for the district attorney to discontinue these cases and let an old man whose only thought is to do good finish his days in peace. The United States will never gain in reputation by being the tool of a lot of unprincipled scoundrels who make a living by hounding men whose wickedest thought is purer than their best. In Europe once the state went into partnership with the church in the persecution business, but it gained only in disrepute. Civilization looks back upon that time with horror, and reviles the government as well as the churches.

ONE of the Sun's Answers to Correspondents reads thus: "The question of the inspiration of the scriptures is still open. Modern study is playing havoc with the Old Testament, according to some persons; according to others, it isn't. Some of the stories of the Old Testament, if told on any other authority than one which all Christians are trained to believe in, would be laughed at as 'whoppers.' There is, however, no reason to think that the writers of the Bible were any more literal and less given to exaggeration than their descendants and countrymen of to-day." Rather plain, that. Did not the Sun's editorial writer who indited these lines overstep just a little that thrifty hedging line of policy in things religious which it had theretofore so deftly followed?

THE latest historian of Portugal, S. Morse Stephens, says of that nation: "When greatness had been achieved history runs into an abrupt decline. From her place as first of nations she fell to one in which her political importance in the councils of Europe counted no more than her area had counted in the area of Europe. Luxury joined to absolutism on the one hand and religious bigotry preached by inquisitors and fostered by an ignoble race of kings lost for Portugal the position which had been won for her by Alfonso and John, by Albuquerque and Vasco da Gama." A similar melancholy passage is to be found in the history of every nation that has allowed the Christian church the ascendency which she always so eagerly seeks. "Religious bigotry preached by inquisitors and fostered by an ignoble race of kings" has furnished the chapters of disaster in the annals of the Roman empire, Spain, Italy, France, Ireland, Greece, Russia, and many another land. It has put upon the record of this nation those disgraceful stains, the chroniclings of the witch-murders and heretic-tortures of New England. It will do the same again if it is given the power.

WE congratulate the legal fraternity of this city as much as we must condole with the heretics of the same burg upon the adoption of the law as a profession by Hugh O. Pentecost, the Anarchist editor of the Twentieth Century. For Mr. Pentecost in taking up law must abandon the platform, and will not be heard at Chickering Hall this winter. This is a cause for regret, for when he turned his attention to the religion he had left Mr. Pentecost was eloquent and convincing on the side of right. He has studied law for the purpose, he told a Herald reporter, of earning money to support his family in the style to which they hav been accustomed. "I am unwilling," he said, "to be very poor if I can help myself, and still more unwilling to drag my wife and children into poverty. No doubt my practicing law is inconsistent with my opinions, but in this case I choose to be so far inconsistent rather than to suffer want if I can help myself. Perhaps it would be more glorious if I should become a martyr, but I am not of the stuff of which martyrs are made, unless I could see that by sacrificing myself I could help some one else. But I do not see how any good could come to anyone by my being a martyr."

LOUD are the lamentations which in these days arise from every man of sense at the infliction upon him in every paper he picks up of fulsome adulation of the pope upon his Labor encyclical. Machinating bishops and donkeyish people find no words exalted enough to convey their sense of the merits of that maundering and misty farrago. The nine Catholic bishops of the New York province say: "As soon as we received your excellent encyclical on the condition of labor we thanked God with fervent hearts that amid the darkness occasioned by erroneous opinions he had shed upon us a light so powerful. We cannot congratulate ourselvs too frequently on having so great a chief and master in expounding the truths of faith and reason." Faith is indeed well expounded in the document, which is mostly taken up with exhortations to place faith in the church for the proper conduct of the social issue. But as to the "reason," there is in it a reason for nothing, a rationalé or justification of none of the principles dogmatically laid down. Archbishop Corrigan of New York declares: "So great is the force of genius which illumins it, so great the knowledge of social affairs, so great, in fine, is its clearness in defining and upholding the principles of the right of private property in land, and its justice in determining the rights and duties of the rich and poor, its wisdom in suggesting remedies for the evils which sorely vex the civil relationship of men in our day, that it is held second to no encyclical letter ever penned by the supreme pontiffs." After this the archbishop, with his mind on his own troubles with McGlynn and his land theory, feelingly continues: "If to one in particular of all the bishops of the country the words of your holiness appear most opportune it is to me, to whom that part of the Lord's flock by the benignity of your holiness has been intrusted, which is more exposed to the sophisms of the Socialists, and who must sustain against them a more ceaseless contention." Disgraceful instance, is this whole glorification of Pecci's boring production, of what Shakspere laments as "gilded honor shamefully misplaced."

Letters from Friends.

The Spirit That You Enfranchise Will Thank You.

FRANKLIN, ILL., Sept. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $10—$5 for my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years, and $5 for the benefit of the good old paper. It suits me. I cannot see how it could be improved. With good wishes for its welfare, I remain, Your well-wisher, ENOAS SCOTT.

Each Freethinker Should Enlighten One New Mind Yearly.

NEW HARTFORD, IA., Sept. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I should hav renewed subscription September 21st, but wanted to send one new subscriber this year as well as last, and at that time had failed to get one. We all ought to get one new subscriber every year for the best paper under the sun, and if we hustle I believe we can do it. MEL PIERCE.

Congenial "Souls" Wanted in Baltimore.

1702 HARLEM AVE., BALTIMORE, MD., Sept. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see no notice of Liberal meetings in Baltimore in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Will some older resident of the city who takes the paper kindly inform me, personally or through its columns, where to find Liberals, as I am lonesome in this God——ly city. JOSIAH FRIEND.

Those Fair Gates Shall Be Opened.

KENT, O., Oct. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Glad you are trying to rouse the American Secular Union to action in defense of our common rights, assailed by the narrow-minded who are trying to close the World's Fair to the people Sunday. I propose to attend the adjacent county fairs this and the coming weeks to canvass for signatures to our petition for Sunday opening.

MARIUS HEIGHTON, Secretary Kent Secular Union.

Wanted—An Editor.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Oct. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: A few weeks since an article in your paper suggested a contribution for its support. Pardon a subscriber for suggesting that what it most wants is an editor able and willing to write one or two good stirring articles and reviews each week on the current religious events—absurdities and news—and other good, spicy, and truthful contributions, which would bring subscribers and funds. It is not now edited but made up of correspondence—some very good, some trash—and scissors. A WELL-WISHER.

A Small Missionary Edition Proposed.

NASHVILLE, TENN., Sept. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It seems to me a good idea would be to publish a small sheet, the midget TRUTH SEEKER, with most of the type set. I think it would be at a low rate. I would subscribe for say one hundred per week for free distribution to children. Likely hundreds of other men would do the same. I think this would be the best plan. I put out over one thousand cards every week and am doing the best I know how. Yours truly, W. W. WILKISON, SR.

An Earnest Laborer in the Vineyard.

LEON, IA., Sept. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You will herein find $3 to pay for the greatest paper on earth, so far as I know. I must hav the paper. It is always the first thing I call for when I come home from a trip—that is, after kissing my wife and child and putting my team in the barn. I shall always do all I am able for THE TRUTH SEEKER and mental freedom. If you will send me anything for free distribution, I will handle it in the best and most telling way and manner possible. You hav some good contributors that must never drop the flag until there are a plenty more of flag-bearers to take their places. FRANK COOK.

Liberals Must Be Aggressiv—If Need Be, Abusiv!

TURNER, ORE., Sept. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: If you see proper to send sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" I will "distribute them where they will do good" around here, and see if any can be sold. This is a small country town, with not many religious people, and very few Liberals. Almost all the non-religionists are non-committal also. Policy? Very poor. Religion always persecutes the timid. If Liberals would stand up and fight, organize and "carry the war into Africa," they would be astonished at the weakness of the enemy. I think that Liberals should be aggressiv, and, if need be, abusiv as well.

Respectfully yours, F. S. MATTESON.

A Philosophic Thinker.

PORT HURON, MICH., Sept. 28, 1891.

MR. EOITOR: I am a poor old man, but hav had the pleasure of reading your paper, with which I was much gratified. I would do all in my power to hav it circulated throughout these United States as well as all other countries in this world, for I consider it the true harbinger of peace on earth and good will toward mankind. I too am one of those outrageous beings that do not believe there ever existed any power that could create something out of nothing. But I am here without my own will, forced into existence and forced through it and will be forced out of it regardless of my will, and am obliged to float in the general current—forced into the world and forced through it and forced out of it by some power I am not acquainted with. It was a strife when I drew my first breath. It is a struggle going through, and will be a struggle going out of this existence. But I do not expect I can carry any of my ideas, principles, sentiments, or disposition away from this world as long as the centrifugal force is stronger than the centripetal force and nothing can be annihilated. All I hav I hav imbibed from others and in turn others will imbibe from me—nothing but that old immutable principle of transmigration; I always was and shall always remain to be a part of this world both physically and mentally.

Your poor but honest friend, SANDS C. CARPENTER.

We Wish Everyone to Do This.

PHILADELPHIA, PA, Sept. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me some of the specimen sheets of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" mentioned in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 18th, and I will distribute them where they will hav their weight felt. If I can induce any of my friends to purchase the book I shall certainly do so. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the best Freethought papers in this country, if not the best. I am not a subscriber, although I take (purchase) it every week from Mr. George Longford, who, as well as myself, is a member of the Philadelphia Liberal League. Hoping to be of some service to you in the future, I remain, Yours courteously, GEORGE M. FRINK.

Both Right—The Word Has Both Meanings.

CLEVELAND, O., Oct. 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Having been a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly one year and a half I take the liberty of writing a few lines. "Does the word Jews indicate persons as believers in a certain religion or does it mean Jews as a nation?" This subject was brought up in the shop I am employed at, and there are some Christians there who claimed that a Jew remains a Jew wherever he goes and as long as he livs, because derived from the Jewish nation. The Freethinkers claimed, contrary to that, that a Jew does not remain a Jew wherever he goes and as long as he livs, and hav given simple proof for the same by saying that at the time of the census the statistics show the Jews not as a nation but as a religion. But this causing a good deal of argument, I hav promised them I will write to THE TRUTH SEEKER and ask its opinion and also its readers'. I am yours in liberty and Freethought,

J. ROSENBERG.

Where He Would Giv Bread, They Choose a Stone.

SELLWOOD, ORE., Sept. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You seem to think that it is no trouble to find folks to read and subscribe for Liberal papers and books. But I hav offered time and again to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER free of charge if they would read it through. But so far no one has agreed to that. But four weeks ago a preacher came here and told that he had been a drunkard and a gambler and all the rest, and he converted about fifty people to the gospel lies. I did not hear him. But to-day I was told that he had baptized fifteen in the river and converted eleven to the Methodist and four to the Presbyterian faith. As to the balance, twenty, I could not learn where they joined in. He seems to be as free and easy as ever. Now, to reflect on a lot of people of that kind, what would you expect to do with such stuff?

In THE TRUTH SEEKER for September 12th, A. D. Swan, Kent, O, says that he is glad he livs under a government where he has liberty to express his sentiments. After he has said how he wished to use accumulated wealth, he has forgotten his own remarks about the Anarchists in 1887.

H. L. LINDELEAF.

Let Us Unite in Prayer for Such Good Ends.

VERNON, TEX., Sept. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.50 to renew my subscription and purchase the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKER'S ALMANAC and "Liberal Hymn Book." On with the good work. I hope to liv to see Freethought spread from center to circumference of the globe on which we liv. I am at home only when in its atmosphere. Christian ground seems to be stagnant with a deadly malaria which stupefies or stultifies the human intellect, and chokes up with superstition every avenue to a grander and higher civilization. The best remedy for all such ailments that I know of is THE TRUTH SEEKER. It possesses the peculiar properties to cleanse and eradicate from the brain all germs of ignorance and folly, to revivify and build up the dwarfed intellect, and prepare the recipient for a higher and nobler struggle for the freedom of humanity from the thralldom of ignorance and stupidity. That this may be the happy lot of all who take THE TRUTH SEEKER let us all unite in prayer Success to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and kindest regards to its whole corps of writers. With anxiety for the future of Freethought, I am truly yours, A. F. MARTIN.

Tricks of the Theological Trade.

INDUSTRY, KAN., Sept. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send you two marked newspapers for you to observe. You will notice how "worldly" the churches are in this Western country. They will do anything to get up an amusement for the benefit of the church. As a church-member told me some years ago in Illinois about another denomination, if they were not ashamed and if people would not look upon it as a disgrace, they would run a house of prostitution for the benefit of the church. And so they would. I find in traveling through this Western country and noticing the drift of the churches that they will stoop to any dirty, mean trick, or get up any kind of amusement or lottery game, to get money out of the people. It has got so nowadays the bigger the hypocrits the better Christians they are. I hav often thought that it must certainly be amusing indeed to their God, J. Christ & Co., to look down from above and see their chosen people enjoying themselvs in a cancan, or something similar to it, for the benefit and glory of the abovesaid Company. But whenever a person approaches them on the subject of the Bible and Christianity and tells them the honest truth about it, they are ready to persecute and call you a blackguard and a blasphemer. I hav said many times, if there is an infinit God and he can do all things and has any decency or justice about him he certainly ought to blot all the churches and their doings out of existence for the good of the people.

But then we must believe and do as they do or be damned. Therefore great is the mystery of godliness.

I made a lengthy reply to Rev. A. Solt, and I presume he is offering up prayers mightily for me, for I know he will certainly think I was inspired by Old Splitfoot when I wrote that letter. J. B. WISE.

A Gallant Move Which Should Be Imitated.

CARYSVILLE, O, Sept., 1891.

MR. EDITOR: With permission of your columns, I wish to present a few thoughts touching the aspect of the cause of mental and moral liberty in this part of the domain of Uncle Sam. For several years there hav been a few of us struggling against the tide of superstition and tomfoolism, and making but little progress in consequence of the opposition of the followers of the great "I am." One difficulty has been a hall or place to meet where we can discuss the glorious truths of Rationalism untrammeled by the fetters of superstition. It seems that old Mother Grundy possesses such a power of influence that even when there is a will on the part of some to cut loose from the bonds of ecclesiastical dogmatism they hesitate, and ask themselvs the question, "How will I stand in the eyes of popular opinion if I cease to be a slave?" Two years ago the writer was engaged to deliver a lecture on "Why Am I a Liberal?" and a hall was engaged at Quincy, the nature of the lecture being explained to the owner. But no sooner was the announcement made than the pious hypocrits of the church raised their holy hands, and put a veto on further proceedings, and the cowardly owner went back on his word and refused us the use of the hall, and thereby defeated the object of the meeting. Some time ago I received a letter from J. R. Charlesworth, announcing that he was about to undertake a lecturing tour, and asking me to arrange for a lecture. Remembering the futility of previous effort, I was about to reply with a negativ. when I chanced to meet a few of the leading Liberals of Quincy, and stated the facts to them, and was authorized by them to write to Mr. Charlesworth to come ahead and they would secure a hall. I accordingly wrote him and he made the announcement in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Quincy, September 21st and 22d. But now, when a committee called upon Mr. Leach and announced the object for which they desired the hall, he raised his hands in holy horror, and gave them to understand that no Infidel should speak in his hall. Being again defeated, Mr. J. M. Putnam, an ex-commissioner of the county, who has served with credit, a man of undoubted integrity, came to see me and to ask what further we could do. My advice was to buy an unseated hall, for sale in our town (Carysville), and be independent. Well, the sequel was, the hall was bought, Mr. Geo. Dormire being the purchaser, and donated to the use of the Freethinkers. Mr. Charlesworth was here and gave us two lectures, "The Philosophy of Secularism" and "Why I Do Not Believe in God." We hav had a rattling of the dry bones of superstition. Maledictions of rage are heard on the corners. The spirit of the Inquisition has taken hold of the minds of the saints, and only for the lack of power the Auto-da-fé would be re-erected. But let the holy smoke ascend. We hav come to stay. We expect to organize here soon, and invite all who hav failed to be saved by being washed in the blood of the lamb to come to Carysville and be soused in the pool of reason and common sense. P. H. MCCROSKY.

For Persons Interested in Cryptograms.

OREGON, MO., Sept. 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The light and scornful treatment given to Donnelly on account of his efforts to solve the mystery of the cryptogram is of a piece with the treatment given to all great discoveries and announcements that tend to shake established beliefs. But those who are accustomed to judicial methods of weighing evidence understand that more weight is to be given to the affirmations of those who claim to be witnesses of actual facts than to the denials of those who hav given either no attention or but a careless glance at them. Thus the testimony of one person who declares he heard a clock strike outweighs that of several who say they did not hear it strike, assuming that one to be competent and disinterested. Concerning this cryptogram hundreds of intelligent persons (Shaksperians) hav given to the work of Donnelly but slight attention, a mere surface observation, and hav declared either that there is nothing in it or else something of no great importance. Then again, few hav access to the original or fac simile famous edition of the cryptogram. And therefore the importance of the subject is not appreciated save by a few who hav carefully studied the works of Donnelly. Very many who had at first given ear to his statements when they heard he had withheld a full explication of the secret of the cryptogram dismissed the whole subject as a humbug of this age of humbugs. But no one who has ever carefully perused the work of Donnelly will deny that the cryptogram is one of the greatest wonders of this age. And like all great truths it must win more and more believers as time passes. The wonder is not that a story is concealed within some of the plays, but the thing in itself outranks the most wonderful of the seven wonders of the world. Many who would examin are repelled by the appearance of so many figures, as was the writer. But after all, there is only one number played on by three or four others variously in order to elucidate each story. And after one story is told perhaps another "root number," as Donnelly calls it, is taken and played upon by perhaps the same few numbers to bring out another story. And so chapter after chapter is drawn forth, and all out of some two, four, or six small columns of a play. That is the climax of the wonder—that a whole volume of a wonderful history is hidden within such a small space of a few hundred words.

It is true, as Donnelly says, he who after examination could call it coincidence could believe that the letters of the alphabet, if strewn upon the floor, would arrange themselvs into Homer's "Iliad." But whether Bacon wrote the plays is another question. That more than one hand was in that work is evident and has always been admitted. There is scarcely a play of that age but had the aid of several minds to fit it for the stage. Hundreds of the most brilliant youths of England and Scotland hung around the theaters attracted by their love of the drama, yet repelled by the low esteem in which actors were held. Any poor scribbler for the stage that had the least wit and sociability might hav a dozen secret aids. Whatever he prepared passed through the hands of able critics as well as poets. Line after line was polished and refined, others added. But clearly the genius that created the stanzas was to the front in many of the greatest plays. Bacon himself shows no poetical ability in any of his known works, and the habit of impersonating everything, seen in every sentence almost of Shakspere, is not witnessed in Bacon. He could not possibly hav repressed this habit all times. And when one compares Bacon's attempt at Hebrew melodies with Byron's he sees at a glance the vast abyss between the poet and the mere writer of doggerel. In his drama of "A Holy War" every character talks like Bacon. As to the cryptogram, we repeat, let the investigator once see that in spite of the several figures used there are but one or two numbers and these are played on by the hyphens and brackets in each column to bring out long connected histories, all brought out of two or four columns, all being fitted together like the finest dovetail work—and his wonder cannot be repressed. How any intelligent person can take care to study the subject for one half hour without becoming a convert to Donnelly's theory, that the secret histories are therein interwoven (no matter as to the authorship of Shakspere), is inconceivable. HOLT.

Fines For Non-Oath-Takers.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Sept. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Although I am not a direct subscriber to your most valuable and very instructiv paper, I never theless receive it regularly every Monday since last February, delivered by the daily paper carrier, thus giving him the benefit of the commission.

For some years I hav been a doubter in regard to religious views, but during these last three years I hav become a solid unbeliever, thanks to some Liberal books, papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the Holy (?) Bible.

Last Saturday, the 19th, I think I was the most disappointed man in the first recorder's court (Judge Bringier presiding) this city. One of our employees was arrested about two weeks ago on two charges—first, for being drunk and disturbing the peace; second, for discharging firearms within the city limits. There were five parties subpenaed to testify and the case was fixed for the day above mentioned, I myself being the last one on the list. All were called upon one by one, and all testified in regard to the first charge, but no one knew anything regarding the second charge, for which, if there is any evidence, the accused would be sent to the criminal court by the recorder. Four witnesses had testified, and yet no evidence in regard to the second charge. I stood a good chance to be called on next, although I knew nothing about the shooting, as I had left before it happened, but the judge certainly did not know this. But how great was my disappointment when the judge fined the accused on the first charge and dismissed the second charge, after hearing witness No. 4, and thus I was not in it. Being subpenaed for 9:30 A.M., but court not opening until 10:30, I whiled away time with several parties I knew, among whom there was one of the court officers. After conversing with him for a while, I asked him what in his opinion the judge would do with a witness who would decline to take the oath, to which he replied he was at a loss to tell, as he had never heard of a case of that kind, but asked me to step over with him to some gentlemen seated around a table near the judge's bench, which I did. The officer acquainted one of the gentlemen (Judge H., assistant-recorder of same court, as I was later on informed) with the question I had propounded to him, and this gentleman's answer was, "Why, if I was presiding, I would send that witness down for contempt of court." "And why would you do that?" asked I of him. "Because," said the judge, "I would be compelled to do so unless you would giv good reasons for objecting to be sworn." I informed him that I would surely giv my reasons and honest opinion for my actions, to which he replied that under those conditions he would accept my statement as a statement only and for what it was worth. "Do you really not believe there is a God?" asked the judge. I told him that although I had diligently searched for one I had until now failed to locate him or form his acquaintance. "But surely somebody must hav made this world," said the judge. To which I replied, "Then surely some one must hav made that somebody, and who could he be?" "God made himself out of nothing," was his answer. "Something cannot be produced out of nothing," said I. "But," says he, "how then do you think that this universe is ruled and governed?" "Our reason is limited, but to the best of my opinions and conclusions, this universe is ruled and governed by the indestructible and uncreatable laws of nature; you know nothing about God; it is only a belief of yours; there is not a particle of proof of his existence; no one has ever seen, heard, smelled, or tasted him, although Moses assures us that he has met God face to face, but I think he was not telling the truth—even Jesus Christ contradicts his statement. Your God even though he be, I could not respect or worship him, for if we wish any information of him we hav to take refuge in the Bible, and according to that obscene book he is the most cruel and unmerciful tyrant I hav ever heard or read of." "Then you do not believe in a hereafter," inquired the judge. "I know nothing of a hereafter," I answered; "our time is now and here, and my religion is: Fear nobody, do right, and help your fellow-man to the best of your ability; no more, no less; let us make the best of this world, and if there is another, though I doubt, then we will try and do the same there as here." As the gentleman did not seem to be inclined to continue this subject, he concluded with a smile and kept the balance of his thoughts to himself. The other gentlemen did not say anything during this time, but after I took my seat again amongst others in the courtroom, I heard one of the other lawyers say that he did not see why my statement should not be acceptable as evidence like that of anyone else, as long as I stated my honest opinions why I objected to take an oath, but sincerely promised to make a true statement to the best of my knowledge. Still another lawyer said that in his opinion in many courts the judges would prefer my testimony to that of others who had been sworn. So here you hav the opinions of different lawyers. But my greatest desire was to hav the opinion of the presiding judge, and herein I was badly disappointed, by the judge sentencing the accused on the first charge and dismissing the second after the fourth witness had testified. The lawyers present, by all appearance, seemed to be as anxious as myself to hear the judge's ruling, but they had to share their disappointment with me.

Do you know of any Freethought society in this city? I would like to join. Lately I inquired if I would be allowed to join the Knights of Pythias, but I was informed I could not. I made the same inquiry with members of the Knights of Honor; result, same answer. Then I asked a member of the Order of Iron Hall what show I had with them. He showed me the constitution and by-laws, and the first lines my eyes fell upon informed me that to become a member I must believe in a supreme being. What's the matter with Freethinkers organizing and forming societies and orders for mutual protection, benefit, and assistance?

I am of the same opinion as Mr. Robert F. Jones and think there are many Freethinkers here, only it needs some activ and energetic man to arouse them a little.

Three cheers for Mr. Heston. His cartoons are excellent; let him continue his good and effectiv work.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

This Must be "Writ Sarkastic" by Some Infidel.

COLUMBUS, WASH., Sept. 2, 1891.

TO THE IMPIOUS EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I am a Christian, a Methodist, one of the shouting order, who weep in meeting, overcome by the prospect of dwelling in their Happy Homes in Heaven, and then go home and without any conscientious scruples sell five cents' worth of apples to a neighbor's little girl for fifty cents; in fact, a true modern follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, and from the privilege of being one of the "blood-washed" I am deriving a great deal of benefit: $100 a year worth, as this is the amount I subscribe annually to the propping up of the glorious religion of the all-powerful.

I am considered one of the main props in this part of the country, and to disturb my upholding inclination means considerable damage to almighty God, therefore I warn you to hav your doctor near you, for benevolent God, in just and merciful divine wrath, will most probably smite you with a rod of iron as the cause of one of your blasphemous papers reaching my virtuous and heretofore unpolluted hands.

I read your paper and was surprised that such a helpless and harmless publication could hav gained such an unenviable reputation as yours has; my generous disposition then led me to turn some of the light of the gospel on you, in the shape of my irresistible eloquence and unanswerable arguments, purporting to bring you to Jesus, hence this communication; I wish to do this partly to ease my guilty conscience but mostly to aid you as a much-needed prop on the contrary side of our glorious gospel, from which reason's wind is about to blow it over.

In true Christian style I will first demolish your evident idol, the devil, by blackmailing him. The devil, sir, is tricky, very tricky; you see, he was educated in heaven, but like the apprentices of to-day soon knew so much that he presumed to giv God himself a few points and vainly thought he could teach him something about meanness, for which presumption he was expelled from heaven, but I weep to say he was not ejected soon enough; he should hav been invited to leave before he had learned all of God's pet bunko schemes, so that he would hav been unable to go around nowadays warning people not to get roped into the fold, thereby making the church lose a large land-office business.

He is also forgetful; he did not recognize in Jesus on earth the little son of God with whom he used to play "mumble the peg" in heaven. No, sir; he did not remember that dear Jesus was the God Jr., and went so far as to offer him all the kingdoms of the earth to which he (Jesus) was heir already. Of course Jesus refused this impertinent offer, as he knew the devil had no clear title to the property other than that of possession since time began. Not being contented with this impudence, the devil went even farther and led the meek and lowly boy of the almighty God astray, kidnapped him, made him lose his trust and belief in his father and thereby his hope of heaven; on the cross he gave voice to this lack of faith, saying: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" 'Tis sad to think that dear Jesus is now languishing in hell, but it must be so, for thus the blessed word teaches. 'Tis hard to know that blessed Jesus was snatched from his all-powerful father to be tortured in his own infernal machine. This must satisfy you of the unscrupulous character of the devil.

You say that the Bible is false because there are contradictions, etc. My dear sir, of course there are contradictions, there must be to make the Bible true. You are probably aware that this Wonderful Book was not written by one sane man, but by many inspired prophets and writers, and contains all manner of languages, including the language of heaven, earth, and hell. This being the case, how do you suppose the language of heaven to agree with that of earth without a conflict? Or that of hell with that of earth? We all know that this is possible with heaven and hell, for these two institutions seem to be pretty well educated in each other's methods—so much so that sometimes it is hard to distinguish that which belongs to heaven from that which is hell's. Not so with this world; when Jacob cried, "I hav seen God face to face," he was trying to fool some of his expected descendants, but all-seeing God, finally, after a lapse of two thousand years, becoming aware of Jacob's intentions, denies it through John, saying, "No man hath seen God," thereby making Jacob's lie a truth again; a contradiction was necessary or else we would hav thought that Jacob really did see God.

The trouble is you do not read the Bible right; you should only pay attention to those passages that feed your soul, leaving those that do not to feed some one else; you will find plenty there that will nourish you; others do, why not you? The murderer finds joy in the life of Joshua, the polygamist enjoys Solomon, the seducer and adulterer finds sweet rest in perusing the life of David, "the man after God's own heart," and the drunkard, gambler, and thief find plenty in that Wonderful Book to gladden their several hearts; surely you can find comfort also.

If you do not succeed in obtaining the desired nutriment within those pages, take it to the Lord in prayer and he who so graciously answered his only begotten son's prayers will answer yours likewise. Come to Jesus now, because now is a good time to come to Jesus.

Some years ago my wife, who was a strict women's-rights woman and a leader among the good Christian sisters, came to me weeping and declared that the Bible was inclined to take her rights away, quoting to me several passages, and especially one from Timothy which stated that women must be in submission. I asked her if these portions of scripture fed her soul, to which she answered most emphatically, "No!" "Then, my dear," said I, "discard them, pay no attention to them." Since then she has forsaken me for a saloonkeeper, leaving a note behind her saying that the life of Abigail fed her soul. I did not blame her, for she seemed to hav done it through her keen sense of religious duty.

The other day an Infidel approached me and said, "Brother Whale, I would like to ask you a few questions concerning religion for my own benefit and instruction." I replied I should be happy to throw any light I was able to on his pathway so dark with doubts, whereupon to my astonishment he asked, "Who made you?"

"Almighty God, of course."

"For what purpose?"

With a feeling of glorious inspiration I responded, "That I might worship, honor, and obey him."

"Is God all-powerful?"

"Certainly; if there is anything beyond his power our minds cannot conceive it."

"Is he just and merciful?"

"Yes!"

"Does this apply to me also?"

"Yes, to everyone; God created all men alike."

"Well, suppose I did not answer the purpose he made me for, how is he then all-powerful?'

I then saw what he was driving at, so waited a few minutes for an inspiration, which came in this convincing form: "He gave us a will of our own."

"Then is it not obvious that he did not create man to consciously obey his dictation but to do as he pleased? How then is he (God) just and merciful if he has an everlasting hell prepared for them who exercise the rights he himself made them master of?"

I then saw I had to crush him, so drove this popular argument straight through him and clinched it on the other side: "Because the Bible says so," then not wishing to see his humiliation, I turned on my heel and walked away feeling I had done my religious duty and that the heavenly choir were singing, "Down went McGinty."

I hav since brought that Infidel to Jesus through the force of similar conclusiv arguments; now won't you follow his example? I trust you cannot resist such burning eloquence and faultless reasoning as I hav displayed. If you decide to come to Jesus, let me know your income that I may estimate the Lord's share of what you possess.

Yours for Christ, A. JONAS WHALE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A-Making of the Hay.*

No threnody of autumn plaint
Shall touch my heart to-day,
If I may sing a labor song
'Mong ricks of russet hay.
I saw them cut the millet down,
With rasping whirr and noise,
Then wished myself a youth again,
To share my brothers' joys.

To load the wagon mountain-high,
To wave our hats and sing,
Beneath the blue September sky
Like lilies blossoming;
Perfume of hay each misty morn,
Sweet memory of a dream
Where roses bordered fields of corn
And later sunflowers gleam.

The autumn lily, azure clad,
So brave to bear life's ills,
Whose modest garments made me glad,
Was over all the hills;
The asters brought their pretty stars
Like purple-shaded lamps,
Whose fringes on the grassy bars
Had draped our dewy camps.

Their paler sisters robed in white,
A smaller blooming throng,
Shone on our meadows morn and night,
To listen to our song;
And blackbirds came and thrushes brown
To join the roundelay,
Where mowers felled the grasses down
A-making of the hay.

Of Practical Benefit.

It is pleasant to know that the Young Men's Freethought Temperance Society is steadily progressing in numbers and influence. This society will undoubtedly hav an important influence in the world. Its members are rising young men whose clear heads and steady hands are wisely to direct, control, and guide affairs in the days to come.

The eyes of Liberals and all others as well are upon their movements to see if they hold out in the way of well-doing. We are confident they will. They are passing the danger line now, but we feel assured they will come out with beaming, joyous faces and colors floating gaily in the breeze. Long life, success, and prosperity attend the Young Men's Freethought Temperance Society.

Stop and Think.

In the last issue of the Freethinkers' Magazine, W. W. Walker writes: "Man is the only animal that can stop and think and deliberately plan and resolve to rise to a higher sphere of action. And here is the hope of our race. When our boys and girls fully realize their high position in nature, and from intelligent, logical convictions resolve by their own strength and efforts to make the most of life, and with this grand purpose, place their animal and selfish propensities under the absolute control of reason and conscience, then will dawn a grander era than our race has yet seen. Even could all the young people interested in Miss Wixon's 'Children's Corner' of THE TRUTH SEEKER be induced to make this resolve and carry it out consistently, the result would be grand. When we grow old, and so deaf and blind that we read and converse with difficulty and consequently hav to draw our entertainment from our own thoughts, then it is that a clean, pure life is of more value than a Rothschild's wealth or a Sir Walter's fame."

An Awful Story.

There was once an awful little girl who had an "awful" to everything. She lived in an awful house, in an awful village, which was an awful distance from every other awful place. She went to an awful school, where she had an awful teacher, who gave her awful lessons out of awful books. Every day she was so awful hungry that she ate an awful amount of food, so that she looked awful healthy. Her hat was awful small, and her feet were awful large. When she took an awful walk she climbed awful hills, and when she got awful tired she sat down under an awful tree to rest herself. In summer she was awful hot and in winter awful cold. When it didn't rain there was an awful drouth, and when the awful drouth was over there was an awful rain. If this little girl doesn't get rid of this vulgar way of saying "awful" about everything, I am afraid she will come to an awful end.

The Legend of the Poplar.

A princess had a jeweled cup, which was stolen and carried by a rogue into a forest, and concealed among the branches of the Lombardy poplar. The princess in distress appealed to a fairy queen, who by her magical power knew, of course, all about it. The fairy went to the wood and questioned all of the trees in order until she came to the poplar. As the other trees indignantly denied having the cup, the poplar became frightened, and when its turn came, it too answered No, whereupon the fairy commanded all the trees to hold their arms erect, and the cup dropped to the ground. As a punishment for the falsehood it had told, the poplar was condemned to keep its arms up forever, and so to this day we see it growing in that way.

Correspondence.

CLEAR WATER, NEB., Sept. 25, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I write to thank you for the books which you sent me.

I hav read them both through, and the story called "All in a Lifetime" is the first I hav ever read that I liked very well.

I am expecting to go to Kansas to keep house for my father. I think we will liv on a farm, and I will hav a horse or pony to ride, which I will be delighted with, for I like a horse.

I feel quite well acquainted with you already, for Aunt Mary so often speaks of you. I will close now.

From your friend, LOTTIE A. BAIRD.

NEWTON, Sept. 30, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav read your paper now over one year. I like it very much. I like the Children's Corner and the pictures best. I am ten years old. My mother says God can do everything and he wishes to make all people good. Will you please tell me why he does not make my father good? Father says he is going to the church and so he comes home drunk and is unkind to mother and me. Mother says God will punish me for reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. Is God vindictiv? I cannot understand why God has made so many bad people. Is it because he wishes to punish them? Dear Miss Wixon, please do not put my letter in the wastebasket, because I want answers to my questions. I send my love to all who write to the Children's Corner.

Your friend, ALICE GLADE.

P. S.—Mother says it is a foolish letter and you will not put it in the paper, and father says I am a fool. I get a stamp of father.

A. G.

[The editor of the Corner deals with only known quantities. She does not speculate much about the unknown. If there is a God and he desired to make people good and well-behaved he would probably do so. People are as they are because of inherited qualities, influences, surroundings, and defectiv education. Will God punish Alice for reading THE TRUTH SEEKER? There would be no reason for such punishment, since THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the best papers in the world, and its readers among the best and brightest of all the world's people, good, intelligent citizens who make the world better by living in it. Is God vindictiv? Only the ignorant, unreasoning, and cruel are vindictiv. We cannot suppose a really noble being could be vindictiv. God made no bad people. They are the result of ignorant parentage.—ED. C. C.]

A FACT probably but little known is that the United States nickel five-cent piece furnishes a key to metric measures and weights. This coin is two centimeters in diameter, and its weight is five grams. Five of them placed in a row will giv the length of a diameter, and two of them will weigh a decagram.

The Bible and Evolution.

By Arthur B. Moss.

New and Cheap Edition, - - 50 Cents.

Mentioned by W. E Gladstone in his work, "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture."

G. W. Foote in the Freethinker recommends it as an excellent text-book. He says: "The manner is good and the style is bright. The reader is carried along on an easy flowing stream of science, history, ethics, and common sense."

Chas. Watts in Secular Thought pronounces it to be the best work the author has written.

And THE TRUTH SEEKER says: "This is an excellent book which we can recommend to our readers as clear in language, trustworthy in statement, and irrefutable in reasoning."

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

Entire states in Russia are being deserted on account of the famin. People hav been driven to pillaging each other, first setting fire to the villages and then robbing the inhabitants. By the united charities of the government and people a biscuit a day is allowed to every individual. The distress is a greater menace than the Nihilists.

Parnell is dead.

Germany is anxious to prevent the election of a French pope.

The Rev. W. H. Quillian, of the English Church in Liverpool, has embraced Mohammedanism.

China has compensated the Jesuits for their sufferings in the riots by the present of a large tract of land.

Republicans are vexed with Elliott Shepard for attacking the Catholic church in his Republican paper.

In the army cases of alcoholism hav decreased from 41.43 per thousand in 1889 and 56.68 in the previous decade, to 40.73.

Now that France has become friends with the Vatican, German Catholics favor that country, to the displeasure of their fellow-countrymen.

A Catholic paper reports that a number of Protestant parents in the West are sending their children to parochial in preference to public schools.

Trouble has arisen from Premier Mercier's peculations. He is backed by the Catholic church, and secession of Quebec from the Dominion is threatened.

At Bayeux, France, a priest has been fined for refusing to giv as evidence information received in the confessional. The bishop has caused an appeal to be made to a higher court.

The Russian grand duchess Paul being at the point of death, her physicians and friends, having exhausted their own resources, sent for Father Joann, the miracle-working priest of Cronstadt, and for the miraculous image of the Virgin. The image was brought from Moscow by a solemn procession, but when it and the priest arrived the lady was dead.

T. J. Lyons, who has been lecturing against the Catholic church, tried to make a speech on the sidewalk at Kansas City. Some one threw a stone which knocked him down. He arose with a revolver in his hand with which he threatened to shoot the next man who threw a stone. His threat was answered with a volley of stones, and he was chased four blocks by a mob yelling, "Hang him!" He rushed through the Gazette office and escaped. The excitement was such that he found it advisable to leave town.

Beril Sintzki, a Russian Jew just landed at Boston, tells that while his family was celebrating the son's birthday a police officer entered and saying they were breaking the law demanded $5 hush money. Sintzki refused, and he and family were marched toward Siberia for imprisonment in the mines. On the journey the captain of the guard offered to release the family if the sixteen-year-old daughter would gratify him. She consented, but her father forbade. To force her submission the captain tortured her by hanging her up by the arms. She died before morning. Nihilists rescued the rest of the family and killed the captain by hanging him up head downward.

Thousands of citizens marched in procession to the Pantheon on the 4th to deposit a wreath on King Victor Emanuel's tomb, where on the 2d inst. a number of French Catholic pilgrims made an insulting demonstration. While the crowd was in the church a number of radicals mounted some of the altars and made violent speeches, denouncing the Vatican, and shouting, "Down with the priests!" A confidential circular has been sent to nuncios abroad, explaining that owing to the disturbances the pope will be unable to receive any more pilgrims. The pope has instructed the papal nuncios abroad to present an identical note to the governments to which they are accredited on the recent disorders in Rome. This note will hold that these disorders are evidence of the insecurity of the papal position in Rome. The Moniteur says that owing to the exhibition of feeling aroused in Rome the questions of the pope leaving Rome and of holding the next papal conclave abroad are reopened.

SATAN GOETH WITH THE BOYS TO SEE THEIR PA.

Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselvs before the Lord, and Satan came also among them.—Job i, 6.

PRICE 25 CENTS.

Gems of Thought.

It has been contended for many years that the Ten Commandments are the foundation of all ideas of justice and of law. Eminent jurists hav bowed to popular prejudice, and deformed their works by statements to the effect that the Mosaic laws are the fountains from which sprang all ideas of right and wrong. Nothing can be more stupidly false than such assertions. Thousands of years before Moses was born the Egyptians had a code of laws. They had laws against blasphemy, murder, adultery, larceny, perjury, laws for the collection of debts, the enforcement of contracts, the ascertainment of damages, the redemption of property pawned, and upon nearly every subject of human interest. The Egyptian code was far better than the Mosaic.—Ingersoll.

It stands to reason that we must go to work with the utmost caution when we draw our inferences from a legend or use it as a contribution to our knowledge of the past. As a rule, indeed, it teaches us nothing about the period in which it places us, but it does teach us something about that in which it was invented or in which it sprang up. We consult the legend of the Drachenfels in vain for the particulars of the contest of Christianity and its conquest over the German heathenism; but it gives us a picture of the thankful joy of the Christians on the banks of the Rhine, as they looked back upon the wretched condition in which they had lived as heathens. From the myth of Indra we can draw no knowledge of nature or of God, but it introduces us to the religious views of nature held by the Hindoos.—Profs. Oort and Hooykaas.

The costliness of writing materials gave rise to a peculiar usage. From the leaves of an ancient work the original writing was erased, more or less effectivly. They were then employed as the material for another work, the latter being written over the former. Such manuscripts are called palimpsests, written again after erasure. The original writing, which is often the sacred text, can, in general, be deciphered, especially by the aid of certain chemical applications. Some of our most precious manuscripts are of this character. After all the bother he put the Holy Ghost to in begetting a son and then writing four different and conflicting accounts of his life, the Lord allowed these accounts to be rubbed off the sheepskin till portions of them cannot be read except with great difficulty, and certain of them cannot be read at all. To be able to read what the Lord has written the devout hav now to resort to chemistry, a science which, for ages, the church banned and persecuted and abhorred. Of old it was, Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; now it is, Work out your salvation with fear and chemistry.—Saladin.

All that certain tyrants of souls desire, is that the men whom they teach may hav their intellects distorted. A fakir brings up a child of great promis; he employs five or six years in driving it into his head that the god Fo appeared to men in the form of a white elephant, and persuades the child that if he does not believe in these metamorphoses he will be flogged after death for five hundred thousand years. He adds, that at the end of the world the enemy of the god Fo will come and fight against that divinity. The child studies and becomes a prodigy. He finds that Fo could not change himself into anything but a white elephant, because that is the most beautiful of animals. The kings of Siam and Pegu, says he, went to war with one another for a white elephant. Certainly, had not Fo been concealed in that elephant these two kings would not hav been so mad as to fight for the possession of a mere animal. Fo's enemy will come and challenge him at the end of the world. This enemy will certainly be a rhinoceros, for the rhinoceros fights the elephant. Thus does the fakir's learned pupil reason in mature age, and he becomes one of the lights of the Indies. The more subtle his intellect, the more crooked; and he, in his turn, forms other intellects as distorted as his own. Show these besotted beings a little geometry and they learn it easily enough; but, strange to say, this does not set them right. They perceive the truths of geometry but it does not teach them to weigh probabilities; they hav taken their bent; they will reason against reason all their lives, and I am sorry for them.—Voltaire.

TROUBLE AT THE GATE—THE MISTAKES OF SAINT PETER.

Notes and Clippings.

A LARGE chair which John Wesley sat in in bygone days has been brought across the water for the use of the presiding officer of the great Methodist council which meets in Washington. Wesley's shoes were left at home, for they are rather large for modern wear.

ARCHBISHOP CORRIGAN said on unveiling Leo XIII.'s statue at Washington: "See how the encyclicals of Pope Leo pour a flood of light on the questions of divorce and Christian marriage; on the constitution of states; on human liberty; on Freemasonry, and last but not least on the condition of labor."

MRS. BESANT, says the Sun, has always been known as an especially practical and rightly honest woman, and whatever the explanation, there is no doubt she sincerely believes what she alleges about the Mahatmas. Speaking in that quiet, earnest way, and almost sad tone which those who heard her in New York will well remember, she said: "You hav known me for sixteen years in this hall, and hav never known me to tell you a lie. Well, I tell you now that since Mme. Blavatsky 'left' I hav had letters from her, in her own handwriting. I don't ask you to believe this, but I tell you the fact on the faith of a record that has never been sullied by a conscious lie."

IVAN SHAFRANSKLY, a master mechanic of Kiev, has come to grief. His wife has complained that he desecrated her sanctuaries. The attorney of the church indicted him, and he was sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for four months. The trouble arises from the fact that he is a Roman Catholic, while his worthy helpmeet confesses the Greek Catholic faith. He became tired of the images of her saints, which his wife kept in the house and persisted in putting in his way. Two such images which he found in his room he broke, and of a third one he put out the eyes with a bodkin. His punishment followed closely.

IN Uvalde, Tex., District Judge Thomas Paschal created a sensation by refusing to grant final naturalization papers to R. V. Sauer, who has resided the proper time in the United States, has made his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and has otherwise complied with all the requirements of law. Questioned under oath, Sauer stated that he was a Socialist and a believer in the teachings of Herr Most. He thought Most to be a man actuated by a desire for the good of humanity and his doctrins should be followed to the letter. In his written opinion Judge Paschal said that Socialism and Anarchism were directly opposed to the Constitution of the United States, and no Socialist or Anarchist was eligible to American citizenship. Sauer will appeal.

A WRITER in Science says that the future man will hav subordinated all things to his will; and nearly all other forms now existing, with the exception of a very few that may prove useful to man, will hav been completely exterminated. The writer deplores "the vast number of what many in the world would reckon our best developed specimens of men, whose minds are still controled by the nursery myths, the miracles, and the fables that were told and sung to the children of the early peoples of the world in Asia. Is the mind of the man of the future to remain in such a condition of thralldom? In fact, the most of the opinions held, the institutions, the very language, the entire organization by and of the best existing types of men, are each and all to me highly indicativ of a very early stage of the development of the species."

THERE are in Russia many severe laws under the provisions of which any dissenter is in danger of being convicted. It is these laws that are being enforced against the Jews. They could as well be enforced against others, but for the fact that there would then be some serious complications. If, for example, Roman Catholics were persecuted as the Jews are, the Roman Catholic powers would probably intervene. If Protestants were persecuted, England would do more than express sympathy with the victims. But the Jews hav no friends among the governments, and therefore they are made to feel the oppressor's hand. Besides, many of them hav considerable property, and the confiscation of that is attended with much profit to the champions of the orthodox faith.

A TRAVELER to Thibet in Asia found a race numbering about three million people, divided into many tribes, each with physical and social peculiarities, but all heavily priest-ridden. At least one male member of each family enters the priesthood, and religion is the most flourishing business in the land. Lamaseries, as the religious houses are called, are as abundant and prosperous as monasteries in Europe during the Middle Ages. The priests differ from the people principally in being better fed and being more insolent; in dirt and depravity, however, the laymen and clerics meet as equals, and a lying match between them is likely to end in a "draw." Much of the land is fertil, and indications of mineral wealth abound, but good food is hard to get and good morals seem invisible. The author found most of the people dishonest, evasiv, suspicious, and lazy; the houses uncomfortable, means of travel rare and everything scarce but prayers, which are the principal local output and all of the same pattern.

THERE is nothing novel in the fact that when the prayers of John of Cronstadt, who was summoned for the purpose, failed to arrest the fatal illness of the Grand Duchess Paul, the sacred ikon was taken from the Iberian Chapel in Moscow and driven out with a coach and six to the Illinskoie Palace to work the miracle of healing. As a matter of fact, this special ikon rarely remains in the chapel throughout any day. It is always being sent for to houses of sickness, and the spectacle of its passage in its own equipage through streets crowded with kneeling, bareheaded spectators is a familiar sight in Moscow. It in this way earns about $50 daily. The czar or any of his brothers or sons never enters Moscow without first driving to the Iberian Chapel and prostrating himself before this sacred ikon or picture of the Virgin. All orthodox Russia would be aghast at the failure to do this. The truth is, what is called Christianity in Russia is entirely a worship of images, and is as much a part of heathenism as fetich adoration on the Upper Congo.

The Gospel According to John.

III.

26. Now comes the marvelous story of the raising of Lazarus, narrated by John alone. Lazarus was sick at Bethany on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, two miles from Jerusalem. Mary and Martha, sisters of the sick man, sent word to Jesus, who loved not only Lazarus but the two sisters. After a delay of two days Jesus proposed to his disciples to go into Judea again. They said, "Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee and goest thou thither?" In answer to this he said, "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth, but I go that I may awake him out of sleep." They replied, "If he sleep he shall do well." Then said Jesus plainly, "Lazarus is dead. And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent that ye may believe; nevertheless let us go unto him."

Thomas, seeing Jesus determined to go, said, "Let us go also, that we may die with him."

Martha, hearing that Jesus was coming, went out to meet him. She said, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died." Jesus said, "Thy brother shall rise again." "I know," she replied, "that he shall rise again at the last day." Then came Mary to meet Jesus, and falling at his feet she also said, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died." It was an affecting scene; the women wept, Jesus wept, and even the Jews who had followed Mary wept.

They all proceeded to the grave where Lazarus had lain four days. Jesus lifted up his eyes and said:

Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. And I knew that thou hearest me always. But because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me.

Then he said, "Lazarus, come forth." And lo! the man that had been dead and buried four days came forth in his grave clothes.

There are cogent reasons for regarding this story as sheer fiction. Read Robert Taylor's essay on the subject, number two of the "Astro-Theological Sermons." He regards it as an astronomical allegory of very ancient date.

27. The fame of Jesus as a miracle-worker caused the chief priests and Pharisees of Jerusalem to call a council. Caiaphas, who was "high priest that year" (his term was from A D 25 to 36), "prophesied that Jesus should die for the nation." And yet there was then no nation of the Jews; they were governed by Roman tetrarchs and a procurator. But the council (which after A D. 30 had no political power) resolved to put Jesus to death; wherefore he "walked no more openly among the Jews, but went thence unto a country near to the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim and there continued with his disciples." Ephraim is conjectured to be sixteen miles northeast of Jerusalem, but no one knows.

The passover being now nigh at hand attracting many to Jerusalem "to purify themselvs," the council ordered that if any man knew where Jesus was he should make it known that they might take him.

28 Six days before the passover (marginal date A D. 33) Jesus came to Bethany, and there took supper with Mary, Martha, and Lazarus. Martha served the table and Mary anointed the feet of Jesus with a pound of spikenard, very costly. Judas murmured at the waste of money for such a purpose; he thought it might hav been given to the poor. "Not that he cared for the poor," says John, "but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein." Jesus replied, "Let her alone; against the day of my burying hath she kept this. For the poor ye hav always with you, but me ye hav not always."

Matthew and Mark say that this was at the house of Simon the leper, and that there came a woman with a box of ointment and poured it on the head of Jesus, not on his feet. But whether it was poured on his head or his feet it was the only anointing he ever received. And yet prior to this anointing he is repeatedly called the meshiha, "anointed."

Luke also mentions the reception of Jesus at the house of Martha and Mary, but says nothing about the supper nor the anointing; and all three synoptics ignore Lazarus.

29 Many people coming to see Lazarus as well as Jesus, the chief priests consulted about putting Lazarus to death also. If he was indeed such a friend of Jesus, to say nothing of his being raised from the dead, how unaccountable is the silence of the other gospels concerning him. And could Paul ever hav heard of Lazarus, much less of his being raised from the dead, when he wrote Cor. xv, descanting on the resurrection of Jesus as "the first-fruits of them that slept?"

30 And now many people that had come to the feast hearing that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, took branches of palm-trees and went forth to meet him, crying, "Hosanna; blessed is the king of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord." And Jesus came mounted on a young ass, in fulfillment of the scripture, "Behold thy king cometh sitting on an ass's colt." But the disciples did not understand this until after the glorification of their master.

The Pharisees were vexed at this demonstration. Certain Greek proselytes who were attending the feast were willing to welcome Jesus, and the Pharisees said: "Behold the world is gone after him."

31. Jesus addressed his disciples and the multitude, saying:

The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified. Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die it bringeth forth much fruit.

This we know is not true. Paul makes the same mistake.

He that loveth his life shall lose it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto eternal life.

A false monkish doctrin.

Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour; but for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name. Then came a voice from heaven, saying, I hav both glorified it and will glorify it again.

Some who heard this thought it thundered. Others said: "An angel spake to him."

Jesus answered and said: This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes. Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.

This they could not understand. But Jesus continued:

Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye hav the light, lest darkness come upon you. . . . While ye hav the light believe the light, that ye may be the children of light.

Having said this Jesus departed and hid himself. Though he had done many miracles yet they believed not on him, that the saying of Esaias might be fulfilled, namely: "Lord, who hath believed our report"—and again: "He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts, that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them." In other words, they were reprobates, predestined to be damned. But there were some of the Pharisees who believed, but were unwilling to confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagog.

32. The last supper, according to John, was not the paschal feast, as described by the other evangelists. It is introduced abruptly in the fourth gospel, chapter xiii, thus:

Now before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them to the end. And supper being ended, the devil having now put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to betray him; Jesus . . . riseth from supper and laid aside his garments, and took a towel and girded himself. After that he poureth water into a basin and began to wash the disciples' feet. . . . So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments, and was set down again, he said unto them, Know ye what I hav done to you? Ye call me Master, and Lord; and ye say well, for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Master, hav washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet.

This command of Jesus, recorded only by John, is obeyed by one insignificant sect of Christians.

Presently Jesus said: "One of you shall betray me." The disciples looked at one another, and Simon Kepha beckoned to John, who was leaning on Jesus's bosom, to ask "Who is it?" And when the question was asked, Jesus answered: "He it is to whom I shall giv a sop when I hav dipped it." And he dipped and gave the sop to Judas.

How could the supper hav been ended before giving the sop to Judas? One translator has taken the liberty to render the words deipnou genomenou, "as supper was preparing" (Emphatic Diaglott). And this dipping of a morsel of bread in gravy shows that it was a very different kind of a supper from that described by the synoptics, which seemed to consist only of bread and wine. John says nothing about eating the body or drinking the blood of Jesus—nothing about blessing the bread or giving thanks for the cup—nothing even about wine. Nor is there anything in John's account of the last supper that agrees with Paul's statement in 1 Cor. xi, 23–27. In short, the supper described by John is not a eucharist; nor indeed could it be, because it was eaten twenty-four hours before the feast of the passover. And yet, according to John, it was the last supper that Jesus ate. He did not liv to eat another.

33. Nearly all of the four chapters of John describing the scene at the last supper is made up of sayings of Jesus and concluding with a prayer. Did John report it from memory? or is it a pious fiction written by a monk?

It is unnecessary to note any part of the speech addressed to his disciples, but one thing in the prayer is very remarkable. Just think of Jesus addressing his father and saying: "And this is life eternal, that they might know the true God and Jesus, Meshiha, whom thou hast sent." Jesus calling himself "the anointed" in a prayer to his father! According to the synoptics he had charged his disciples that "they should tell no man that he was Jesus the meshiha" (Matt. xvi, 20; A D. 32). But in the fourth gospel Jesus discloses his messiahship to everybody without reserve, and at last informs his father in heaven of the fact.

34. From the supper table Jesus and his disciples went forth over the brook Kedron and entered a garden where they had often been. The synoptics say they went out to the Mount of Olives, which was farther on, and thence to "a place called Gethsemane," supposed to be at the foot of Mount Olivet. Here, according to the synoptics, Jesus retired to pray and suffered agony. But John takes no notice of all this. Judas with a band of officers came with lanterns. Did he kiss Jesus? John does not say he did. "Whom seek ye?" said Jesus. They answered: "Jesus the Nazarene." "I am he," said Jesus, and they went backward and fell to the ground. Again Jesus asked them, "Whom seek ye?" and again they answered, "Jesus the Nazarene." "I hav told you that I am he," said Jesus. Then Simon Kepha drew his sword and cut off the ear of Malchus, the servant of the high priest.

In the reign of Queen Alexandra (78–69 B C) her son, Hyrcanus, was high priest, and contemporary with him was one Malichus who poisoned Antipater, the father of Herod the Great, and was in turn assassinated by command of the Roman general Cassius at the request of Herod, about the year 43 B C. Malichus was at the time of his death in company with the high priest Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. xiv, 11; War i, 11). Malich was his Hebrew name.

35 The officers led Jesus away "to Annas first," says John, and adds in parenthesis: "For he was father-in-law to Caiaphas which was high priest that same year." Matthew and Mark do not mention Annas, nor does Luke, except to say that Annas and Caiaphas were high priests when John the Baptist was preaching. But Ananus I. was high priest A D. 7–21, and Joseph I. (Caiaphas) A D 25–36. The blunder of calling Annas high priest is repeated in Acts iv, 6 John does not call Annas high priest and a little farther on says: "Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest." And that was all that Annas did according to John.

36 "Simon Kepha followed Jesus and so did another disciple," says John, which other disciple was John himself. Suppressing his own name John magnifies his own importance. John knew the high priest and went into his palace with Jesus, while Simon stood without the door. Then John went out, and speaking a word to the damsel who kept the door, brought Simon in. But the damsel thought she recognized Simon and said: "Art thou not one of this man's disciples?" He replied: "I am not." Does it not seem as if John was an abettor of this falsehood, and that he also pretended not to be a disciple of Jesus in order to watch the proceedings?

Again, as Simon Kepha stood warming himself by the fire with the officers, they said: "Art thou not one of his disciples?" And again he answered: "I am not."

Once more, a servant of the high priest and a kinsman of the man whose ear Simon cut off, said: "Did not I see thee in the garden with him?" Again Simon denied, and then the cock crew. But John does not say that Simon cursed and swore, nor that he went out and wept bitterly. ANTICHRIST.

Herbert Spencer's Latest Work.

The ability of Herbert Spencer as a writer on subjects pertaining to mental or moral philosophy and social science is now so generally acknowledged by thinking men, that anything from his pen commands immediate and thoughtful attention. His latest work is entitled "Justice," and is the fourth part of his great works on "Ethics." To me it appears to be his best. In a little over three hundred pages he has stated the principles of justice in a remarkably plain and logical manner. There are no catchpenny phrases, no appeals made to bigotry, no leaning on authority. He seeks to point out what is justice, pure and simple, and states his conclusions in well-considered language. There is no mistaking his meaning. He is a master of pure English. It would be difficult to select language which could better express his exact meaning. Throughout he manifests a quiet and manly courage, using no opprobrious epithets nor bluster toward anyone.

He appeals to no standard but reason. He teaches no moral that can offend anyone who is not so wedded to superstition that nothing can satisfy him which is not taught by his church or indorsed by his pastor or priest. Above all, his principles are in harmony with each other, and all other known truth. This is a sure test of truth. There is not a crime or a vice that receives countenance from this noble work, nor is there one that is not condemned by the application of the principles of justice as set forth by him.

Having no book, no creed, no catechism to defend as the perfection of reason and right, he manifests no superstitious reverence for any human or pretended divine authority. He therefore is not engaged in reconciling his principles with either the Bible or any creed or profession. He wastes no words with them, but quietly leaves them unmentioned. This is as it should be.

This book is a complete justification of the idea that the purest and soundest morals can be taught without even mentioning the Bible or God or Christ or Christianity, or in any manner claiming or admitting that a perfect system of morals cannot be ascertained and taught without any reference to the teachings of one or the other of them. Fifty years ago when the Bible was quoted both to attack and defend slavery, with the advantage largely favoring slavery, one E. R. Tyler wrote a book attacking that institution, entitled "American Slavery a Malum In Se" (wrong in itself), in which he showed that slavery was wrong in every detail and from every point of view—wrong to the slave, injurious to the master, the community, and the state—but admitting that some slaveholders were better than the law required them to be, or not as bad as the law would permit them to be (as some Christians are better than their Bible and their creeds), and throughout the book he never quoted or referred to the Bible or Christianity in support of his positions but said he purposely avoided it, in order to show that natural law alone condemned the institution in every particular. Spencer's "Justice" is written in about the same spirit. He depends upon easily understood natural laws to sustain his teachings.

This book should be on the table of every Freethinker. It teaches the principles of justice. It will help to get its readers into the very useful habit of relying upon reason, and overlooking or discarding mere authority, Bible, or creed. It will widen the reasoning faculties in young men, and set them into broader and more manly channels of thought and action, and by so much as it does this it will make its readers better men, better neighbors, and better citizens. Appleton & Co. hav done the public great service in the publication of Spencer's works.

Dr. Barnsfather's Consumption Cure.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Having just received THE TRUTH SEEKER for September 26th, I observe therein (upon page 613) with much surprise, a letter from a gentleman who signs himself "M. L. Holbrook, M.D., editor of the Herald of Health," proffering me some gratuitous advice, which I must claim the privilege to decline to take, and courteously declaring that I am "on the wrong track."

When such a learned and accomplished editor issues a decree of that nature, everyone who has heard of his great genius and talents—and who among us has not, who has read the opinions he frequently givs of himself?—will expect that a great amount of value will be put upon his ipse dixit, which, as far as my humble opinion goes, appears in this case to be nothing short of a protest against the possibility of there being anything new in science under the sun. His words in effect are, that having left a beaten track, which he himself admits has hitherto failed to cure phthisis, I am "trifling with nature." Dr. Martin Tupper, of respectful memory, sings that "Glory shall be tinctured good or evil by the character of those who giv it," and that being so, I must humbly but distinctly assert that neither Dr. Holbrook, nor any other narrow-thinking personage, however accomplished, or supposed to be so, has any right whatever to become, and at his own hand constitute himself, a dictator to me or to other researchers regarding a matter which to suffering humanity has unfortunately been a deplorable mystery as to its speedy and effectual cure, and which for that veritable reason has inter alia been my special study for now over a quarter of a century, and I boldly question, notwithstanding the respected position which the venerable doctor holds as the editor of the Herald of Health, whether he rightly understands and appreciates the full value of such researches. In my opinion, and the Editor's in the valued TRUTH SEEKER just received, it is proper I should publish to the world, just as Harvey, Jenner, and others published the results of their earnest investigations, what I claim I hav discovered, so that hereafter sufferers may be benefited, and on the other hand my reward may be to verify the saying of a great and learned writer, that "the mind of a researcher that was among men, has in his writings become embalmed." If Dr. Holbrook, in place of endeavoring to advise other medical investigators to refrain from letting the world know the results of their microscopical researches, would, in his so-called Herald of Health, or elsewhere or otherwise, try his best to encourage them to giv publicity to their ideas, it would be a thousand times better and more consistent with his position than tendering gratuitous advice regarding matters about which he seems still to be totally in the dark.

The world will rejoice, I hav no doubt, when the learned and erudite doctor publishes his promised great work of enlightenment on "The Hygienic Treatment of Consumption," to which he refers in his letter, if it possesses the real value at which he himself appreciates it. As to the doctor's inconsistent assertion that "there is about as much superstition in medicin as in religion," the former being his own chosen profession, I do not believe, nor will any of your readers do so, that that great scientific art, brought as it has been to comparativ perfection, its numerous beneficial powers and efficacies having been proved and acknowledged beyond doubt, ought to hav the finger of scorn and dubiety pointed toward it, as compared with the comparativ speculations regarding religion which at best, it must be universally admitted, are nothing more nor less than the teaching of a tacit and fanatical faith and belief in that which possesses no substantial or reliable evidence of verity on this side of the grave.

I boldly adopt your kind but just remark, Mr. Editor, that I hav every reason "from my experiments (so far as they hav been made)" to be perfectly delighted with their results, and as it is quite true that "the patients are all enthusiastic as to the treatment," I liv in the joyous and satisfactory hope expressed by you, sir, that soon "the saving of lives will begin and the reign of the terrible scourge must end."

If there is a reasonable ray of hope of such a gratifying result, does the learned editor of a so-called Herald of Health, I ask, wish to defeat its consummation, and that by what cannot be defined as anything short of a mealy-mouthed prejudice and ill-natured jealousy? JAMES BARNSFATHER, M.D,

Fifteenth Annual Congress.

The Fifteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the Board of Directors to meet in Philadelphia, on Saturday morning, Oct. 31, 1891, at 10 o'clock, in Industrial Hall, corner of Broad and Wood streets, for the transaction of business, and to continue over Sunday, November 1st, if the Congress shall so determin. No arrangements will be made for reduced railway or hotel rates.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal right in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution, rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons of whatever faith to its membership on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in its broadest sense, as applied to the state and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Materialists, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, Progressiv Jews, and Liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and Puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platforms and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as upon the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or woman, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

All who work for religious liberty are welcome to the coming Congress of the American Secular Union in the City of Brotherly Love. R. B. WESTBROOK,
President American Secular Union.
Attest: IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.
Philadelphia, Sept. 16, 1891.

In Colonial Days.

October 4th Attorney W. F. Cooling lectured before the Chicago Secular Union at Fort Dearborn Hall, 181 West Madison street, on "Constitutional Religious Liberty."

"It seems to be a common delusion," said Mr. Cooling, "that liberty has been indigenous to the soil of America and that the particular phase of it known as religious and intellectual liberty has been especially the glory of our ancestors. It is the belief of many also that in some manner the federal Constitution guarantees to us exemption from the interference of religious intolerance, notably from the forced subjection to the imposition of a state church, clergy salaried by the state, and in short that church and state are forever separated here. It will surprise many therefore how different is the truth. Church and state united before the Revolution continued in a manner united for many years afterward, and this union has not been entirely dissolved, nor is there any provision in the organic law of the United States that would prevent a majority of any state from establishing the worship of the Grand Llama of Tibet under any possible penalties to nonconformists.

"All of the original thirteen colonies in some manner had an established religion and nearly all had an established church. In the New England colonies Congregationalism was established by law, in the Southern colonies the Episcopal church or the Church of England had the same dignity."

Continuing in the same line of thought the speaker claimed that in the charter of New Hampshire liberty of conscience was extended to all Protestants, "meaning thereby the extreme so-called orthodox element and that especially of the Church of England." That the first constitution of New York recognized a like condition having there existed by abrogating such parts of the common law and statutes as established any Christian denominations or their ministers. That in Connecticut the Congregational church was established by law, while in Virginia from the beginning the Church of England was established. That the Church of England was established in Georgia by statute in 1758 and in Maryland something before the Revolution. In Massachusetts by statute in 1716 "a minister qualified by law, able, learned, and orthodox and of good conversation," was to be supported by taxes. "But," continued the speaker, "in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, no church was ever formally established, but at the same time in these latter colonies there was only the exemption from compulsory support and attendance of church worship, the most severe penalties being threatened against Infidels, Catholics, and idolators, who are generally classed together, and everywhere the old common law of England prevailed and the ideas of the old sixteenth century that it was the duty of the state to exercise a general police power over the thoughts and morals of the people."

With the independence of America he claimed there was no sudden break in religious sentiment, and that the 1st Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion nor prohibiting the free exercise thereof," does not prohibit the states from passing statutes in regard to religion, for says the Xth Amendment of the federal Constitution, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the states are reserved to the states respectivly or to the people," and that in fact several of the states continued under their old colonial religious laws on their statute books, and under the laws and constitution of Massachusetts as late as 1834 there is a case on record wherein "a soulless corporation" in the way of a nail factory was taxed to support religion, the laws providing for the support of ministers, which was abolished in 1835.

But the speaker claimed that even yet in New Hampshire and South Carolina no Agnostic, Catholic, Mohammedan, Buddhist, or Jew can hold any office under the laws of those states.

GOVERNMENTS, all will admit, hav improved; and, as laws are the expressions of the wills of the governed, it follows that men collectivly, and therefore individually, hav improved. If society is better, man is better. The social conditions of the Middle Ages, or the Roman empire, or the days of Abraham were morally inferior to those of to-day; and though, individually, man's morality does not seem to hav kept pace with the material improvement of his circumstances, it must be admitted that it has advanced, and therefore probably will advance.—Robt. C. Adams.

News and Notes.

The Portland convention was a most successful gathering. The meetings were well attended. On Sunday evening the new Arion Hall was filled. A thousand people were present.

The work of the Oregon state Secular Union during the past year has been excellent. Everything was done that could be done by the committee appointed to bring the matter of church taxation before the legislature. It was found almost impossible to secure action. The politicians are afraid of the business. They don't want to touch it. Yet it is a fact that three-fourths of the legislature were in favor of taxing church property. The bill, however, in favor of this was not brought forward. It was difficult even to introduce it in committee. This shows the necessity of untiring work, and it will be years before the Demands of Liberalism will be even fairly considered by the legislature. The Union will not giv up the fight. It will increase its forces and make bolder efforts.

President Beal declined reëlection. He has made an admirable officer. For many years he has been a leader in the cause of Liberalism. He now leaves Oregon for Washington, but not very far away from Portland. He has located a town on the Columbia river. The name of the town is Athens. It is near the sea and offers great facilities for shipping. It is expected to hav railroad communication with Portland and the sound. Mr. Beal says that he will build a Freethought opera house at Athens and hav it ready for dedication to Universal Mental Liberty next Paine's anniversary, January 29 h. I hope there will be a grand rally of Liberals on that auspicious occasion. Athens promises to be in the future a Liberal city, and those who desire to locate amidst such influences in a beautiful and flourishing country with the broad river and the broad sea before them could not do better than take a trip to this point, or communicate with C. Beal, of Cathlamet, Wash., who will tell them all about it. Portland and the Columbia river hav a great future. Wealth and enterprise are bound to develop the resources of the magnificent lands from the Willamette to the Pacific ocean.

Mrs. Krekel has labored incessantly in the lecture field for the last six months, and has traveled thousands of miles day and night, on buckboard, stage coaches, etc., and kept the fires of Liberalism burning through a long line of country. She did not think it advisable to continue the field secretaryship and declined reëlection. The Union feels that her work has been valuable and the results will not be lost. If the advance cannot be accomplished one way it will another.

J. Henry Schroeder was elected president. He is one of the best workers in Oregon and will carry on the purpose of the Union with the same pertinacity and enthusiasm that characterized the labors of Mr. Beal.

Mrs. Sarah C. Todd, of Forest Grove, was elected secretary. She is well known for her ability and earnestness in the Liberal cause. Reuben Wright, the treasurer, is a stanch supporter, and with these officers the Union will keep its flag bravely flying. The list of vice-presidents was revised and those selected from each county who could be depended upon to do the best work. It was the objectof the convention to hav a reliable executiv force in the field during the coming year. It was unanimously resolved to raise a fund of $500 in addition to the nearly $400 already contributed for the expenses of the convention and the work of the field secretary the last year.

The convention constantly increased in numbers from beginning to end and closed with enthusiasm and hope. Those present felt that we were moving on—that from year to year there is progression, and the Secular Union was never in a more promising condition. The proceedings of the convention were harmonious. With many differences of opinion on many subjects, concerning the great and general principles there was the utmost accord.

I enjoyed the convention. There was an inspiring atmosphere about it. I met many friends and the handshake was cordial all around. Oregon Liberals can feel proud of what they hav accomplished. The past year has been a notable one of patient and courageous work, and so far as the Pacific coast is concerned we can say, "This old world is growing brighter."

From Oregon with its woods and hills and sweeping rivers and busy marts, up the vast and beautiful Willamette valley in the evening sun of October 6th, aboard a long train of cars crowded to the utmost capacity, I speed towards golden California. I met Hovey, of San Francisco, and Nelson, of Woodburn. Hovey gave me an item which I will put into News and Notes, as it givs a very interesting piece of information. It is as follows:

DEPERE, WIS., May 19.—Father Duren of St. Joseph's Catholic church has evolved a new idea and formed a society for the relief and deliverance of poor souls in purgatory. The society is organized on the insurance assessment plan, the initiation fee being twenty-five cents and the annual contribution ten cents. Among the benefits enumerated in Father Duren's prospectus are: "Participation in the prayers and masses said for the society," and "a special share in the novena of masses celebrated in St. Joseph's church from November 2nd to November 10th." A novena of masses will be said for any member of the society as soon as the news of his death is received by the director.

This is a fine assurance policy. The poor man once could not hav masses said for his soul. He didn't hav money enough. But now the spirit of coöperation prevails. Poor men can combine—pay a small initiation fee and monthly assessment and in this way be sure of a mass for their eternal benefit. They won't be left out in the cold. The church has caught on to the insurance idea with a delightful frankness. What next?

Sleeping and nodding all night long, I arrive Wednesday morning Oct. 7th at Grand Pass, a bright and lively city of about fifteen hundred people, with many elegant buildings that would do credit to a metropolis like Portland. It is the county seat of Josephine county. The hills about it are wild, rocky and wooded. They present a picturesque appearance. Grant's Pass is indeed a pretty place, and though business is rather dull just now, it has a fine outlook. There are productiv lands in this county and the lumber is almost exhaustless. Immense forests are on every hand.

I hav struck a squad of ministers here—about seventy, from all parts of the state—real blue Presbyterians. It is a synod, I understand. I hope some of these clergymen will attend lectures. There are so many of them, they ought not to be afraid of one Infidel speaker. My platform is free. Let them come out in force and see what they can do. It is seventy against one. Now is their time or never.

I giv two lectures at Grant's Pass, and the attendance is very good, considering that a whole synod is on the other side. I hav twice as many the second night as the first night. I was introduced by William M. Richards, a pioneer Liberal here, who himself can take the platform if need be and defend Freethought. John G. Abbott is another of our sturdy supporters; George Dean and William Dean and George Walters are also in line. Grant Orme and Mrs. Sarah Huggins join THE TRUTH SEEKER ranks, and others are coming. I enjoyed my stay. These are the first Freethought lectures in the place, and the outlook is attractiv. Fine churches are here, but there is not much market for theological goods.

I leave Grant's Pass on Friday morning. It is glorious weather, and enchanting prospects spread around as I dash through Rogue river valley; the hills luminous above the fields, which are ornamented with a thousand homes, the orchards and gardens glittering with varied colors. Mount Pitt rises like a mighty pyramid in the glowing south. Thence from the valley the long train slowly climbs the Siskiyou range and scenes of wild magnificence unroll upon the vision—enormous hills, vast chambers resplendent with autumn colors, red and yellow and gray and dark green mingling in flaming pictures. Through the immense circles we rise, while from out the towering and majestic forms Mount Shasta again pierces the sky in snowy splendor—far shining on our pathway for a hundred miles. Then amidst solitudes, except for the thundering train, we leap along the Sacramento, which dashes in wild glory from cañon to cañon. It is gorgeous sunset now. The golden clouds float over the vast canopies. Amid the lustrous twilight rises the silver moon, and flings its tremulous radiance on the white foam of the river and the dark encircling trees. I fall into the land of dreams, while the red eye of the iron horse sweeps the broad valley. When I look upon the purple dawn, the bay is before me—the glimmering fields and the misty mountain tops, the towers of Oakland, and the picturesque hights of San Francisco, and before breakfast I am at the Freethought office, and shake hands with Brown, Replogle, and Donlevy. Business is going on here, although Freethought has taken its eagle flight to the Atlantic—not to sink, but still to pour its burning life into new paths. I hardly recognize the office when I see it, for a fresh emblazonry is in front of it, with gorgeous hues, and I am not sure I am in the right place until Brown givs greeting. Beautiful picture-books and stationery are here—THE TRUTH SEEKER—and I hear the music of the job printing-press. We are not dead, although a change has come over the spirit of our dream. If we cannot work one way then we will work another. Yes, it is different from what it was when I started on this journey; but if the familiar pages of Freethought do not greet my eyes, nor the "man with the badge-pin," still along the vast line from East to West the flag advances.

I cannot close this letter without asking my Freethought friends who hav stood by me and the work so well for years to accept with courage and confidence the new movement, and I hope that everyone on the list of Freethought will be on the list of THE TRUTH SEEKER and help make it a more powerful journal, for by swelling its ranks we can aid the victory of our cause. From the Atlantic to the Pacific we must keep up the conflict, we must cultivate the spirit of fraternity.

I also ask our Liberal friends of the coast to aid in maintaining the branch office at San Francisco. It is of importance. We do not ask for any gifts of money, but for business. Buy books of us, hav job printing done. If you want beautiful pictures of yourselvs and families, Freethought office has made arrangements to furnish them cheaply and skillfully. Now that the weight of the paper is taken off our hands, the other branches of the business can be made a success and we can hav a cheerful rallying-place for Freethinkers on the coast. THE TRUTH SEEKER will be our avant courier now, but we will keep a fireside glow at the Golden Gate.

The Bible in the University.

WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION,
FREMONT, WASH, Sept. 28, 1891

TO THE BOARD OF REGENTS OF THE WASHINGTON STATE UNIVERSITY, Gentlemen: The Washington Secular Union, with local branches in nearly every district in the state (alike east and west of the Cascades), organized to protect its members and all other worthy citizens in the "absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment," as guaranteed by our state constitution, respectfully calls attention and solicits your earnest consideration of the following facts:

Article I, Section 2 of our state constitution reads: "Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual.

"No public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment."

The law of our legislature (page 516, Session Laws 1889–90), an act in relation to the establishment and government of the University of the State of Washington, provides:

Section 15. "The funds of the University shall be derived from the proceeds of the sale of land donated by the United States for the endowment of a university, and the admission and tuition fees of the students and such appropriations as the legislature may make."

Sec. 21. "The sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated out of the state treasury," etc.

It is not denied that the University is sustained by appropriation both of public property and of public money. Nevertheless, at a meeting of the board of regents held in the city of Seattle July 10, 1890, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the religious exercises in the University be confined to reading passages in the Bible and repeating the Lord's Prayer.

The board of regents thus declared that reading the Bible and repeating the Lord's Prayer constitute religious exercise.

The constitution of our state declares: "No public money shall be appropriated or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction."

The State University is created and maintained by the civil government, and therefore is a civil, not a religious, institution, and is not maintained in the interest of or opposition to religion, nor in the interest of any denomination or sect, but of the people, by the people, for the people.

The sole purpose of our State University is to provide the highest Secular education to its students, not to impart religious instruction or to provide a place of worship.

The state has no right to teach in its University or in the public schools or elsewhere the Christian, Jewish, Buddhist, or any other religion.

The attempt of any body of Christians to introduce their denominational doctrins and dogmas into the University would by every other denomination be rightfully denounced as a monstrous usurpation.

Liberty of opinion, liberty of worship, liberty in all matters pertaining to religion is not a privilege created or awarded by the state, but a right inherent in the personality of the individual conscience, and the state of Washington is pledged by its constitution not only not to interfere with that right, but to protect it.

The board of regents has no more right to authorize, much less to pay from public money for, the erection of a chapel in connection with the University, or to pay salary to any person to conduct religious exercises or giv religious instruction therein, than it has to apply the funds of the University to sending missionaries to the so-called heathen.

Our worthy superintendent of public instruction, a member of your honorable board, recently applied to State Attorney-General Jones for his official opinion as to the legality or constitutionality of conducting devotional or religious exercises in our public schools.

Your serious attention is solicited to that opinion. Our state attorney-general quotes Justice Lyon: "That reading the Bible in the school is sectarian instruction; that a pupil of ordinary intelligence is instructed thereby in sectarian doctrins."

In conclusion, after reference to numerous authorities, he decides that reading the Bible is strictly religious exercise within the meaning of Article I, Section 11, providing that no public money or property shall be appropriated for religious worship or instruction.

The Washington Secular Union, its officers and members, are without exception the devoted friends of the University, and it is because of our deep interest in its prosperity we desire there shall be nō just cause for any sect, denomination, or class of people to oppose or use influences against it, but rather that all can unite in its support and the true intent and purpose of its institution be fully accomplished.

Confident your respect for the constitution and laws of the state will insure your prompt rescinding of the resolution complained of, and that you will forthwith issue the necessary orders to insure compliance by the faculty with the requirements of the constitution prohibiting religious exercises or instruction in connection with studies of the University, I hav the honor to subscribe myself,

Yours respectfully, C. B. Reynolds,
Sec. Washington Sec. Union, Fremont, Wash.

What Is the Matter With Wettstein?

I should judge by his writings that Brother Wettstein has a very hard and bitter life or he would not think it would be such an affliction to hav life continuous.

Is not life here, even in this rudimentary and undevelcped state, worth the living? I think so. I suppose that about as many thorns hav been mixed with the roses that hav bordered my pathway along life's highway as it is usual for mortals to find, and yet I think it is a blessed thing to hav life, to be able to see the golden sunshine, the bounteous harvest fields, the broad expanse of prairies and forest, to listen to the carol of birds, the laughter of childhood, the grand strains of music, even if by virtue of these capacities we see deformities, ruin, devastation, and hear discords and wails of agony.

It is worth so much to feel the warm hand-clasp of a true, loyal friend; to look into his eyes and read a soul of truthfulness and integrity, even though sometimes enemies simulate it and we are deceived. In fact, I think this earth-life with its aspirations and disappointments, with its hopes and fears, its successes and failures, is really worth the living.

If this be true, and this is, as it must be, if continued individual existence is a fact, the childhood or rudimentary state, the future instead of being a misfortune must be as much more desirable than this, as a life of great intellectual and moral attainments is preferable as a promoter of happiness and individual well-being to a condition of ignorant undevelopment. The artist who laid down his brush with his ideal but half suppressed, the singer with his soul full of harmonies that would bless his fellows by expression, the mathematician with his problem but half solved, the scientist with his truth undemonstrated, the inventor who saw his great work not completed, whereby the world could be sent onward in its evolution a hundred years in a day; all these could take up their work again, complete their tasks, and permanently reap the result.

I remember hearing J. H. Burnham in a lecture on one occasion say: "I do not know that there is a future life, but it seems to me there ought to be." So it seems to me. After a life of mistakes whereby valuable lessons hav been learned, of attainments, through great personal sacrifice and heroic endeavor, whereby, in some measure, the "how to liv" has been learned, it would be more desirable to go on reaping the results of one's attainments and adding thereto than is this beginning of life in such abject ignorance and helplessness.

Yes, it is glorious to liv here, notwithstanding all our disadvantages, and the more we grow in wisdom and goodness the more glorious life will become. And I am convinced by irrefutable evidence that the change denominated death, whereby is sloughed off the cruder from the finer material, makes no change in the character of the man, only givs him greater advantages for unfoldment. Life is a precious boon, Brother Wettstein, and the more valuable as it is enriched by experiences.

Paine's Portrait in Independence Hall.

The portrait of Thomas Paine in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, is a copy of an original by J. W. Jarvis, of New York, an intimate friend of Paine. The copy was made by Bass Otis, of Boston, for Mr. F. L. Taylor, who, after sixteen years of protracted struggle, succeeded in getting it placed in the "museum." Mr. Taylor now resides at Lawyer's Road, Campbell county, Va. In 1861 he published at Burlington, N. J., a pamphlet entitled, "Testimonials to the Merits of Thomas Paine."

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

The religious circles of Germany are highly agitated on account of the frequent indictments and subsequent trials for heresy among the Protestant as well as Catholic clergy, which seem to increase rather than decrease in number.

Friedrich Schüneman-Pott, lecturer of the Free Religious Society of San Francisco and a well-known writer on ethical and Freethought subjects, died in St. Helena, Cal., on August 3d. Mr. Schüneman was born in Homburg (Baden), April 5, 1826. He studied for the ministry of the Lutheran church at the University of Marburg, but before he was ordained he renounced the Christian religion and accepted a call as lecturer for the Free Society of Nordhausen. In 1848 he was indicted for high treason and thrown in prison. After his liberation he went to Halberstadt, where he gained the friendship of the old Baron Ernst von Pott, who subsequently adopted him. In 1854 Schüneman came to America and was for sixteen years lecturer for the Free Society of Philadelphia, from whence he removed to San Francisco. We extend our sympathies to his relativs and with them mourn the loss of a good and prominent co-worker in the cause of Universal Mental Liberty. His remains were cremated at Los Angeles.

The Federation of Free Religious Societies of Germany numbers 79 societies and 10 auxiliary divisions. The society of Berlin has 4 000 members; of Offenbach, 1,600; of Magdeburg, 1,000; of Manheim, 755. About 10,000 members are found in Prussia, 7,000 in Hessen, 200 in Baden. The Federation numbers about 50,000 members, and aside from the property owned by the individual societies has a bank account of 3,675 marks.

Italy is a bad place for the clergy to prosecute unbelievers. Editor Novelli of the Florence Vero Monello (The True Rogue), who was indicted for irreverence and blasphemy of the holy Catholic humbug, was discharged. The audience that crowded the spacious courtroom could not refrain from cheering the verdict. The sky-pilots made themselvs small and disappeared down the backstairs.

Among the prominent Freethinkers of Sweden we must mention Anton Nyström. Besides an outspoken and activ worker in the cause, Mr. Nyström is likewise a writer of prominence, and recognized as such by historical scholars and students in all countries. Last month appeared volume V of his "Allmän Hultur Historia," (General History of Civilization), and the verdict of the press, both Swedish and foreign, is highly favorable. We hav read volume I, and do not hesitate to place him far above Buckle, and for sound philosophical judgment he is superior to Lecky. It is amusing to notice the silence of the press in general as to Mr. Nyström's anti-Christian belief. The scientific journals only dare mention the fact that the greatest living Swedish historian is a Freethinker.

It is distressing for us to contemplate the ignorance of Freethinkers. How often hav we not inquired, "Where is hell?" and the only answer we received was the mocking echo. It has been left for our opponents to locate our future abode. In the Jesuit catechism by Father Scourville (Luxemburg, 1873) we read the other day as an answer to the question, "Where is hell?" "Hell is inside the earth. It is not large. It need not be, for the damned are hurled headforemost down in the abyss and packed like sardines in a box, and between them, under them, and above them soars the fire."

In Fritänkaren of September 15th is published a stenographic report of Victor Lennstrand's debate with the Rev. N. Nymansion, which took place August 16th. We hav read all of Mr. Lennstrand's lectures and speeches that hav been published, and are hence able to giv a judgment of the value of this his latest production. We think Mr. Lennstrand has surpassed himself. The lecture is full of facts; now stern, now pathetic; now he points out the inconsistencies, the cruelties of the Christian religion, now he hurls the spear of sarcasm against the Christian faith. Space will not permit the translation of this his excellent addition to Freethought literature; but we cannot refrain from giving one short extract containing one of the most powerful indictments of Christianity by one who did believe, and who sought peace and found it not: "I discovered that no matter how earnestly, how devoutly a man asked God for a favor, a favor that was not opposed to his honor and the welfare of mankind, but which would serve both, yet he would not listen to the prayer. I did not turn away from him the first time nor the tenth nor the hundredth time he answered me not. I hoped, I prayed; I thought, He is trying my faith, he will draw me to him, and when the time comes he will fetch me out of this darkness to light and truth; but the time never came. I inquired, I read the Bible from end to end, crouching upon my knees, but not one question did God answer, not one doubt did he solve, not one ray of light let shine on me." We advise our Scandinavian friends to send for Fritankaren No. 18 and distribute it broadcast among their Christian neighbors. A better campaign document cannot be found.

The harvest weather in South Germany is bad, hence the archbishop of Köln has ordered prayers said asking for good weather. Here in America we make the weather.

Five new societies were added during the month of September to the French Freethought Federation.

August 2nd the Freethinkers of Paris and delegations from most of the French counties unveiled a statue in honor of the Freethought martyr, Etienne Dolet. Several thousand people were present, and while the bands played La Marseillaise the covering was removed, and the handsome statue greeted with the cries, "Liv the Republic! Liv Freethought!" The lateness of our announcing this event is due to the non-appearance of La Raison.

The yearly congress of the French Freethought Federation will be held at Salle de l'Ermitage, rue de Jussieu 23, Paris, on Oct. 25th.

No. 14 of our contemporary Der Lichtfreund, edited by Edward Schwella, was confiscated by the imperial police of Vienna, because it contained a bad article entitled "The Defects of the Christian System of Morals." We congratulate our friend Mr. Schwella, for such persecution generally works the other way, and we suppose he has already received a goodly number of new subscribers. The imperial police should turn its attention to the morality of the imperial family. The treatment of the unfortunate countess Maria, the victim of the suicide and murderer the late crown-prince Rudolph, proves that that family needs regulation badly, and also a new moral guidebook besides the family Bible.

Resolution.

The Farmer's and Laborer's Union of Good Hope, Dayton, Rhea Co., Tenn., at its last session adopted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, The Nstional Farmers' Alliance, at its recent session at Ocala, Fla., adopted a resolution requesting the closing of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday, or as it was termed the "American Sabbath:" and

Whereas, Governmental interference in the interests of any particular creed or religion is an abridgment of the untrammeled exercises of religious preferences and religious liberty guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and therefore an infringement of a cardinal feature; and

Whereas, Our order being strictly non-sectarian, should take no stand discriminating either for or against any religious tenet;

Resolved, That we deprecate this hasty and ill-considered step toward the restriction of individual freedom of conscience, and earnestly request our supreme counsel to reconsider its action.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. Bell is at Des Moines, Ia., where he will make his headquarters while lecturing in Iowa.

Of Mr. Charlesworth's lecture in Chicago, E. A. Stevens writes: "I exceedingly regret that circumstances made it impossible for our friend Charlesworth to meet with the welcome of which he is worthy. Owing to dangerous illness in my family when the time arrived for activ efforts to make the lecture a success, I found myself fully occupied in the sick chamber. Realizing that personal work is worth more than $100 in newspaper advertising, I wrote Mr. Charlesworth to postpone lectures till his return trip. Those he never received, but came on full of anticipation of a good time and a large audience. The only thing to do was to go ahead and make the best of it. If the audiences were meager, they at least were appreciativ, and while the lecturer may hav been disappointed by the lack of numbers, his hearers were more than satisfied—yes, astounded—at his masterly exposition of the 'Philosophy of Secularism.' It was not a basket of literary chips taken from various writers and patched together like some amateur lecturers, but a thoroughly studied, logically reasoned, and trenchantly expressed discourse. It was a lecture with a vertebra. One of Mr. Watts's admirers said he doubted if Mr. Charlesworth's noted countryman could hav done better. The evening topic thrilled the audience with admiration for the young orator's splendid sarcasm, his forcible array of damaging facts, and his complete refutation of theological pretensions, culled with care from their own authentic sources. 'Christianity Condemned by its Own History' is just what its title indicates, which was another agreeable surprise."

English Notes.

The Theosophic dispute waxes warmer and warmer, and the English people are getting thoroughly sick of the whole thing. Mrs. Besant has almost ceased to be interesting. Clever she undoubtedly is; eloquent and charming in her discourses, she cannot fail to be; but the shrewd common sense of the multitude revolts at the foolishness of her Mahatma theories and the simplicity of the folk who can be found to put their faith in her assertions about precipitated letters and other marvels. But if anything further were needed to cause the destruction of the Freethinkers' admiration of that gifted lady, it would be found in the newly developed belief in our old friend Jesus Christ. Who does not know how Mrs. Besant pulled him to pieces in the good old days? Then she disbelieved in him body and soul. Evidences were not lacking as to the hollowness of the Christian faith. Without other evidences she now accepts him as a fact—an initiate who permitted himself to be reincarnated one hundred and seven years before the Christian era (Madam Blavatsky said so, and so it must be true) for the good of mankind.

Well, enough is as good as a feast, and we hav had more than enough of Mrs. Besant and the new religion.

The Bradlaugh Memorial Hall scheme is traveling over a rough ground. Counsels are divided. Mr. Foote, the excellent president of the National Secular Society, is strongly in favor of saving the Historic Hall of Science as a fitting memorial to our dead hero. Other people, more ambitious and much less prudent, would prefer to wait a generation while larger funds can be accumulated, and then erect a pretentious memorial. Meanwhile Bradlaugh's chiefest work would be languishing; his name would lose much of its power through forgetfulness, and the Freethought party would hav relinquished a fort it could never again hope to capture. Surely if funds could be collected through the wide, wide world for a more fitting memorial in the course of thirty years there is no reason why that should not be done; but meanwhile to day must be allowed to look after to day, and we must do Charles Bradlaugh all the honor we are presently able to do.

On Sunday, September 29th, the Manchester people unveiled their testimonial to the great leader. In their hall in Rusholme road, now beautifully and tastefully decorated, a life-size portrait of Charles Bradlaugh was unveiled by Mr. G. W. Foote. Mr. and Mrs. Bradlaugh-Bonner took part in the ceremony, and Mr. J. M. Robertson, editor of the National Reformer, was in the chair. I was favored with an invitation to speak, but unfortunately a business engagement in London and a late train conspired to land me in Manchester just as the audience was leaving the hall. Mr. Sickert is the artist, and he has depicted the honorable member for Northampton pleading his right to a seat in the House at the bar of the Commons. The face is from a photograph; but the clothes are painted from the clothes he actually wore. Manchester is a lively home of Freethought. Besides the work going on in the hall, they hav two out-door stations where Freethought addresses are given, and in many other ways Secularism is sent winging its course through Cottonopolis. The best of it is, that with all their vigor the Manchester folks grow still more vigorous.

Talking of out-door work, our London program for October shows that winter is coming upon us. From May to September, inclusiv, some thirty out-door stations are hard at work on Sundays delivering lectures and distributing literature. The majority of lectures are given in the morning about 11:30. Some are given in the afternoon or evening. Only two or three halls giv lectures during the summer months. The October list shows but fourteen places at work, although there are a few not upon the list which are still activ. Six indoor stations publish their lecture list, and to those must be added yet others whose lists were not ready for publication in the monthly paper. For all that, we are everlastingly being told that Secularism is dying out, and even Mrs. Besant pretends to believe it. As a matter of fact, Freethought is raising its head in the most unexpected places, and is more or less openly advocated by the most unlikely persons. Only last week a new work, published by the well-known firm of Eliot Stock, in Paternoster row, and entitled "Credo and Credulity," openly avows that Colonel Ingersoll hopelessly defeated Mr. Gladstone, Cardinal Manning, Judge Black, and the four other champions who attacked him. The writing is obviously parsonic and the diction American, but its matter is no more convincing than that of the seven champions whose incapacity to argue with Ingersoll the writer ventures to supersede and rectify. One test of the growth of Secularism in London is to be found in the inability of the Christian Evidence Society to cope with our efforts. Their original policy was to put up one of their lecturers close against our platform wherever we raised one. It was soon found that we outstripped them, and that if we were short of lecturers to satisfy the districts that crave for lecturers, they were still less able to find man for man to interfere with the work already in hand. Yet they may hav legacies and bequests whilst we may not; their work is popular whilst ours is considered disgraceful; they hav Christian prejudices in their favor whilst we hav them dead against us. Had we, then, one-half of their advantages Secularism would go on by leaps and bounds.

Mr. Watts has been received with warm welcome on his return to London. I hav not had the pleasure of meeting him yet, though recently we were in Manchester within a few hours of each other and stayed at the same hotel. Last night, in Liverpool, I had a long chat with an old Secularist, Father Stocker, and he tells me that Miss Ada Campbell, who lectured here on Sunday, gave very great satisfaction. She does not quite seem to understand English methods and is thought to ride the horse rather too highly for English palates. This I gathered also elsewhere. In a brief while, no doubt, she will tumble to our insular ways and her eloquence will go far to increase the already great warmth of feeling which exists between the Freethinkers of England and America.

Our London Letter.

An article in the Contemporary Review advocating the secularization of cathedrals on the ground that the clergy are falling behind in the intellectual race, has brought forward the champion word-spinner, Mr. Gladstone, to say a few words in their defense, and his reasons for saying such an assertion is inaccurate, untrue, and unjust are somewhat peculiar. He names five individuals who hav died within the last two years as specimens of the intelligence of the clergy, an archbishop, a bishop, a dean, a canon, and a layman who wrote a few theological essays, all of them men whose names are or soon will be forgotten, and who hav done practically nothing for the instruction or benefit of the world. He moreover states that all the public schools of this country hav clergymen for head masters, which statement is, however, erroneous, as the Pall Mall Gazette points out, and even were it otherwise, it does not prove that such schools are any better off through being under such control. The best men the world has seen hav not by any means been instructed at these schools, which turn out a great majority of very useless and ignorant individuals. Another very curious argument is that in certain ecclesiastical dictionaries the bulk of contributors hav been clerics, as though it required a great effort of genius for a member of a close profession to write in favor of his own craft. Mr. Gladstone may hav very great faith in his particular religion, but when he says "there is nothing that has come in the field that is going to supplant the old religion of our fathers," whatever he may mean by that, he is talking nonsense—but were he to liv long enough to see the present state of religion overthrown, he would no doubt be able to clearly show that this prophecy of his meant something quite different.

The Theosophical controversy in the daily Chronicle has now terminated, all bets are off, and no one probably has gained any real knowledge on the subject; the letters filled up a gap in a slack season and increased the sale of the paper and the London public is now patiently waiting for a new sensation.

The bishop of Jerusalem has been very much upset because he was not allowed to preside at the meetings of the missionary conference, and has attacked his opponents through the medium of a pamphlet, which has been considered by the house of convocation. It appears that the bishop has not a sufficient supply of missionaries and the society cannot afford to increase the staff. The society he also accuses of engaging in systematic aggression on the churches of the East, which the society denies, though it contends that its duty is to "convert the Jew, Moslem, and heathen to Christ." The archbishop of Canterbury has advised the disputants to "pursue their allotted work in peacefulness and straightforwardness," etc., etc. The Jew, Moslem, and heathen who are supposed to be anxiously waiting to be converted must be highly entertained by these squabbles and greatly desirous of belonging to such a happy family.

It appears from letters lately appearing in a religious weekly paper that the Young Men's Christian Association is anything but a success. Even with the inducement of many secular additions the affair has flagged. It was expected that the gymnasium would be a splendid draw, but the athletic members don't care for the prayer and tea meetings and those in favor of the latter forms of dissipation will not develop their muscles; so as a last resort to prop the affair on its legs is a suggestion that the Young Women's Christian Association shall amalgamate with the male society. It will be interesting to watch the result of this somewhat dangerous experiment, for hysterically religious people are as a rule rather inclined to erotic tendencies.

The president of the National Secular Society is by no means apprehensiv that the Freethought movement is in the same weak state as the Young Men's Christian Association, as he has further enlarged his journal, the circulation of which must hav increased considerably to induce him to take such a step. His paper appears to be the most popular, as well as financially the strongest, of all Freethought papers published in this country.

Mr. Watts has made a good beginning here, and will no doubt effectivly spread the gospel of Freethought over the middle and north of England. Mr. Baker, of Birmingham, has promised to do still more for the cause when he sees headway is being made.

Lecture Notes.

At Pittsburgh I had a good audience notwithstanding the excessiv September heat. There is a strong band of Liberals here, and when they try to do anything they generally do it handsomely. Among the veterans there I met Roman Staley, Harry Hoover, Anthony Barker, and many others. From Pittsburgh I went to Massillon and delivered two lectures in the Opera House. I was royally entertained by Mr. W. S. Moke and wife. Between the morning and evening lecture we took a pleasant drive to Canton and from there to Meyer's lake, where we found hundreds of people enjoying themselvs in various ways. I shall long remember my Sunday at Massillon.

I did not lecture in Chicago, but went about seeing the sights. The World's Fair occupies much of the people's thoughts here, and if all signs do not fail Chicago will set the civilized world to talking about this Fair, because it is to be the World's Fair.

I stopped a few days at Clinton to see Brother James A. Greenhill, one of the true-blue Liberals, and to hear Brother John E. Remsburg giv two of his grand and well-known lectures, namely, "False Claims" and "Thomas Paine." The latter was delivered at Lyons, an adjoining town to Clinton. The lectures were well attended and highly appreciated. In addition to what I hav said about Mr. Greenhill, I may parenthetically remark that he is a Scotchman by birth and an astronomer from choice. Star-gazers should make his acquaintance.

Mrs. Allen, although not a Freethinker, entertained us just as well as if she had been one.

From Clinton I took the cars for an all-night ride to this place. And when I reached Des Moines what a reception I did get! It rained and rained, and the streets grew muddier all the time, and I could not get around to find our Liberal friends, and had to betake myself to a hotel, where I sat at a window writing letters and occasionally lifting my eyes from the paper before me to glance into the street, where surged the irrepressible pedestrians. There were the moving umbrellas bobbing one way and another, the splashing feet in the mud, and the heavy sky hanging down almost shutting out the light of day. Here was another day to be remembered. I had to possess my soul in patience. I hav always made it a rule when it rains to let it rain. It is in vain to try to pray the rain off or on. It has its own way.

The next day was pleasant and I found our Liberal friends.

Brother John R. Charlesworth lectures here tomorrow. I will mention the lecture in my next. He is winning a good name wherever he goes. I shall remain in Des Moines as my headquarters during October and November, and then return through Kansas and Texas to California. Liberals along the southern route will please correspond with me before I get started.

C. L. Swartz Again.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you please let me say a word about the Swartz matter? Your correspondent, H. J. Wernwag, evidently does not understand the situation. Mr. Swartz is neither the proprietor nor the editor of the Sun. He writes up no one, has never done so, in what is not "his Sun." Mr. Swartz was simply the Topeka agent for the Sun, and it was his business to hand out the packages to the newsboys. The newsboys still sell the Sun in Topeka but who acts as agent I do not know.

If the editor or publisher of the Sun defames anyone's character the law is open to him, and the Sun's proprietors can be held responsible. It matters not if the "authorship of any squib" can be proven or not, the publisher is known and can be held responsible. But no one has complained, no one has prosecuted for libel, and it was not on that ground that Mr. Swartz was arrested and indicted, but for circulating indecent literature, and this when the Bible circulates freely. These virtuous spasms of legislators who fear to hav their own acts uncovered are too thin to admit of the idea that these wise Solons hav any real care for the morals of the people, and in spite of their restrictions the Sun still circulates in Topeka.

Mr. Swartz has a family; he depends upon his labor for his and their support, and the profit on the papers sold would hav supported his family.

When Mr. Wernwag will work month after month in a liberal office for two-thirds of what he could earn elsewhere simply because he wants to see the work go on, he may talk about being a liberal; but if he continues to judge adversely of that of which he really knows as little as he seems to know of Mr. Swartz's case, I think he had better go into the Catholic church and stay there, for he could do liberalism less harm than when claiming to be a liberal. I use the small l to designate liberality in the general sense, for some of those who spell their liberalism with a capital letter are anything but liberal.

The tone of the Sun does not please Mr. Swartz any more than it does myself, but it is not any more indecent than are many of the placards posted upon fences and advertising boards pledging cures for lost manhood, private diseases, etc., and such advertisments are found in almost if not all of our daily papers, and, with the present crowded condition of the labor market, if a Liberal, a genuin thinker, should refuse employment in any and every thing which his sense of right condemned, his chances for bread and butter would be slim. Liberals should be intelligent enough to see that every encroachment upon the freedom of the press weakens by so much the bulwark of what liberty the church has not succeeded in taking from us, and if the Sun or any other paper is suppressed for telling of what exists such suppression does not do away with the facts. It seems to be considered more indecent to tell of bad things than it is to liv them. Society can never be purged until its uncleanness is opened up to view and with the intent of purging. LOIS WAISBROOKER.

How to Keep Out of Hades.

For this cause God shall send them strong delusions that they should believe a lie (2 Thess. ii, 11).

Here is a blessed promis of the most high God to the children whom he loves.

It may be argued that the people to whom this promis was made were wicked in the sight of the Lord, but they were not wicked enough to merit damnation until they had believed a lie, and he sends them strong delusions for the express purpose of helping "the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders" (2 Thess. ii, 9).

Surely "all power and signs and lying wonders" in the form of a delusion would be sufficiently strong to make one believe almost anything.

Nevertheless, God feared that they would believe the truth, notwithstanding Satan's "all power, signs, and lying wonders." So he also sent strong delusions, that they should believe a lie.

Why did he wish them to believe a lie?

In order that they might all be damned.

Here let us observe that believing a lie, however strong the delusion may be, is an act worthy of damnation. It is important, therefore, that we seek the truth.

We must be continually on the lookout, not only for Satan, but for God, also; for the latter sends us strong delusions that we should believe a lie. He puts lying spirits into the mouths of his prophets (1 Kings xxii, 23; 2 Chron. xviii, 22). "If, therefore, a prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, the Lord hath deceived that prophet" (Ezek. xiv, 9).

These and many other instances show clearly that God has kept his promis concerning the strong delusions he would send, and we are, no doubt, even now laboring under strong delusions, believing more than one lie and in a fair way to be damned, so let us look out for these delusions of the Lord, or he will get the best of us.

We will begin at the beginning.

In Gen. i, 27, we are told that God created man in his own image, male and female, both at once; while in the second chapter we find a different statement—to the effect that God created the male first and the female afterward; but nothing is said about God's image. Is not one or the other of these a strong delusion? Were there two different creations of man, or are these merely two accounts of the same creation?

Let us beware of delusions.

Perhaps we shall say there was but one creation, of which we hav two accounts. Very well. Then Adam and Eve were the only persons on the earth until their children, Cain and Abel, were born, when there were four. But Cain killed Abel, when only three were left, two men and one woman; but the next thing we know Cain has a wife (Gen. iv, 17).

Where did he get her? Did he marry his mother?

Our only way out of this dilemma is to believe in two distinct creations, but here may be a strong delusion.

Alas! we cannot escape it, and we shall surely believe a lie, no matter how we fix it.

If we believe in one creation of man and believe also the story about Cain's wife, we are believing a lie, unless Cain married his mother.

But it seems that God himself believed in two creations, or perhaps more, for he put a mark upon Cain to keep others from killing him, and Cain evidently believed the same way, for he feared that he should be killed by everyone that found him (Gen. iv, 14, 15).

Who was there to kill Cain?

In Gen. v we find the case still more complicated, for we are told that male and female were created the same day, and both were named Adam. Is this a strong delusion?

The Bible tells us that Michal had no child unto the day of her death (2 Sam. vi, 23). It also tells us that she had five sons (2 Sam. xxi, 8).

One of these is a delusion. One of these is a lie.

The Bible tells us that Christ and God are one. (John x, 30). It tells us that God is greater than Christ (John xiv, 28).

One of these is a delusion. One of these is a lie.

The Bible tells us that the righteous shall hav wealth and riches (Ps. cxii, 1–3). He shall lay up gold as dust (Job xxii, 23, 24), and in his house shall be much treasure (Prov. xv, 6).

The Bible tells us that riches are a curse. "Woe unto you that are rich" (Luke vi, 24). And one of these is a strong delusion. One of these is a lie.

No evil can happen to the just and good (Prov. xii, 21; 1 Peter iii, 13). But that was not the case with Job, who was a perfect and upright man (Job ii, 3), but who was tortured until he cursed the day of his birth.

Which of these is a strong delusion? Which is a lie?

Elijah went up into heaven (2 Kings ii, 11).

No man ever went to heaven (John iii, 13).

Which of these is a strong delusion? Which of these is a lie, for believing which we are going to be damned?

We are told over and over that some of us are going to heaven and the rest to hades, which we must believe until we find that man hath no preeminence above a beast, for both man and beast go to one place (Eccl. iii, 19, 20).

One of these is a delusion. One of these is a lie.

What shall we do among all these strong delusions? How can we avoid believing a lie? How can we escape the damnation of hell?

The Bible tells us how the earth was made, but geology tells a different story.

The Bible tells us that the earth is flat, rectangular, and stationary. Astronomy disagrees.

If the Bible be true, then science is a lie, and mathematics are a strong delusion sent for the purpose of making us believe a lie that we might all be damned. "He that believeth not, shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16). Holy mother and holy water be with the deluded sons of men. CHAS. O. HAYS.

It Worried Him.

I'm a man that's gittin' old and gray,
And I worship God in the good old way.
I've allus tried to do my best,
And leave with him, the good Lord, the rest,
And never to question what I can't see,
But there's somethin' what's er botherin' me.

What is't? Well, never mind, I'm commin' to it;
I don't want er go runnin' through it—
Jest giv me a chance ter hav my say—
Suthin' like the mortgage—time ter pay.
Can't giv yer jest the right idee,
But will tell yer what's er botherin' me.

The other night when I come in from work
Pretty tired, for I'm no shirk,
If I do say it. I've allus earned my bread
By the sweat of my face, as the good Lord said,
But you may think I ain't what I orter be
When I tell yer what's er botherin' me.

I come in from work, as I said before,
An' was met by wife at the kitchen door,
With a smile on her face as she's allus carried
Ever sence what we've been married—
You may think I mean haw when I say gee,
And somehow can't tell yer what's er botherin' me.

The children were playin' at hide and coop
In the front room and 'round under the stoop.
Say, it makes an old feller like me feel young
Ter see the grandchildren all back hum,
With every one in childish glee,
But that ain't what's er botherin' me.

Yer see, William's boy, the oldest one yet
On them what was playin' out on the front step,
Comes in and climbs up onter my lap,
He knows I think him a right smart chap,
He likes to hear stories about the sea—
Eh! think there's nothin' botherin' me?

William's boy he goes to school,
And the marm, says she, "He hain't no fool."
And he says, "Grandpa, this world's round,
And from anywhere, pint'n in, that's down."
And so he talks, and I thinks, and we Can't make it out an' its botherin' me.

Now I allus calkerlate when I git down to pray
That heaven's up, so I looks that way.
Now, sposin' I's on the tother side
A prayin' ter him what fur sinners died,
Would I look up er down ter see?
Now that's just what's er botherin' me.

Doubt and Faith.

Lecture by S. P. Putnam at Odd Fellows' Hall, Snohomish Wash.

There were not seats enough to hold the people who went to Odd Fellows' Hall Thursday evening to hear S. P. Putnam speak on "The Philosophy of Camp Meetings and Revivals." A good many came and went away because there was no place to sit down. Those who stayed, however, got their money's worth, and a whole crowd of our solid citizens were there.

Mr. Putnam came upon the platform promptly at 8 o'clock, and began his lecture by quoting a remark from Sam Jones, the revivalist. Jones said a year or two ago, and repeats the remark on all occasions, that he would rather be the worst criminal in the world than an avowed and outspoken Infidel. Jones, of course, presents Christianity as containing all that is good in the world and Infidelity as representing all that is bad. Mr. Putnam desired to correct this misrepresentation. The difference between Christianity and Freethought was not the difference wholly between good and bad, but a fundamental difference concerning the philosophy of life. Christianity commands us first to believe. Infidelity (which the speaker repudiated in its generic sense but accepted as meaning Freethought) tells us to doubt before we believe. Doubt, as Aristotle says, is the beginning of wisdom. This is the vital distinction between religion on the one hand and Freethought on the other. The one emphasizes the necessity of believing; the other of proving first and believing afterward. The foundation doctrins of Christianity, Mr. Putnam said, were total depravity, vicarious atonement, and an eternal hell-fire. Under the head of belief the speaker named some of the absurd things we are expected to believe in order to be a Christian, among which is the Jonah and the whale story, that Christ indorsed and used as a prophecy of his own coming and of his own mission to save the world. As Jonah was sent to save Nineveh, and as he was three days in the whale's belly, so Christ was sent to save the world and would spend three days in the heart of the earth. The speaker showed the absurdity of the Jonah story and the lack of agreement between the record and the prophecy. In the course of his remarks Mr. Putnam inquired if, in presenting the fundamental truths of Christianity, he misrepresented Christianity? A voice in the audience emanating from Mr. Sweeney, the real estate dealer, replied that he did. Mr. Sweeney was therefore invited to the platform to defend his faith, and when Mr. Putnam had closed his discourse he took the platform.

Mr. Sweeney, who professed to be "a sort of a Christian," contended that doubt never accomplished anything; that all the good in the world came through Christianity; that the incentiv to do good had its source in religion. Doing right, he maintained, was wholly unnatural and must be inspired from above. Being a trifle mixed in his biblical lore, the speaker affirmed that he believed God stopped the progress of the sun while Joshua crossed the Red sea, and that the story of Jonah living three days in the whale's belly was literally true. The audience detected his error in confounding the army of Joshua with the children of Israel and laughed immoderately until he closed his address.

In replying to Mr. Sweeney Putnam walked all over his opponent. He said in the outset that he had not been describing "a sort of a Christian," like Mr. Sweeney, but the genuin orthodox article. Right and wrong were independent of the deity, and God could no more make one represent the other than he could make twice two five. Facts would be facts in spite of divine interposition, and the justice of God must conform to human justice or it would be no justice at all. The foundation of morality, he held, was not in any commandment, but had its sanction in human experience. Whatever, on the whole, increased the sum of happiness was moral, and any line of conduct resulting otherwise must of necessity be condemned. He took up the arguments of Mr. Sweeney one by one and presented the facts which refuted them. He closed by reciting the poem, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" and the applause with which it was greeted showed that he had captured the audience.

From here Mr. Putnam goes to Portland, to participate in the annual convocation of the Oregon State Secular Union.

Home Again.

After an absence of five months I find myself again at the place which has been home for nearly thirty years, but in that time the home has been bereft of every human tie; only myself and the walls now constitute home. I hav been into the far West and hav enjoyed a great deal, but I am "Yankee" to the last degree and would not if I could hav my home on those great prairies. Everything is too new. I like the old better. But not to-day will I say much about my visit. Please giv this note a place in your paper, so that my correspondents may know my whereabouts and not address me at Orange City.

That Prize Manual.

Away back in 1889 the president of the American Secular Union thought it would be a good thing to hav a Manual for schools which should teach morality without teaching religion, and he called upon the Freethinkers of the country to subscribe one thousand dollars as a prize for the successful writer of such a work. Eleven hundred dollars were subscribed by the following persons:

Leonard Geiger, Hudson, N. Y.	$150 00
R. B. Westbrook, Philadelphia, Pa.	100 00
George E. Swan, Beaver's Dam, Wis.	100 00
Joseph Sedgebeer, Painesville, O.	100 00
W. H. Forwood, Major U. S. A.	100 00
W. H. Pepper, Petaluma, Cal.	100 00
Almond Owen, Milwaukee, Wis.	100 00
N. F. Griswold, Meriden, N. Y.	100 00
F. C. Mende, Philadelphia, Pa.	20 00
George Stephen, Moline, Ill.	25 00
O. Childs, Moline, Ill.	25 00
R. Butterfield, Sacramento, Cal.	25 00
M. D. Fisher, Attleboro Falls, Mass.	25 00
William Smith, Geneva, N. Y.	25 00
Burgess Monroe, St. Paul, Minn.	25 00
E. B. Foote, New York.	25 00
John D. Powers, Woodstock, Vt.	25 00
Photius Fisk, Boston, Mass.	20 00
C. W. Sanders, Portland, Ore.	5 00
Total	$1,100 00

The matter was recently called to our attention again by the query, "HAS THE TRUTH SEEKER any news to giv its readers about the Prize Manual which was to be published in September?" Inquiry at the Secular Union's office found the book, which it seems has been on the market for some time, and we can now supply orders for the same for $1.50.

The book is called "Conduct as a Fine Art," by N. P. Gilman and E. P. Jackson; but it consists of two works, complementary of each other—"The Laws of Daily Conduct," by Nicholas Paine Gilman, of 148 pages; and "Character Building," by Edward Payson Jackson, of 230 pages. Mr. Gilman is editor of the Literary World, while Mr. Jackson is one of the masters of the Boston Latin school. Mr. Gilman's preface to his part of the work is as follows:

"The American Secular Union, a national association, having for its object the complete separation of church and state, but in no way committed to any system of religious belief or disbelief, in the fall of 1889 offered a prize of one thousand dollars 'for the best essay, treatis, or manual adapted to aid or assist teachers in our free public schools, and in the Girard College for Orphans, and other public and charitable institutions, professing to be unsectarian, to thoroughly instruct children and youth in the purest principles of morality without inculcating religious doctrin.'

"The members of the committee chosen to examin the numerous manuscripts submitted were: Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B., president of the Union, Philadelphia; Felix Adler, Ph. D., of the Society for Ethical Culture, New York; Prof. D. G. Brinton, M.D., of the University of Pennsylvania; Prof. Frances E. White, M.D., of the Woman's Medical College, and Miss Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the Union. As, in the opinion of a majority of the committee, no one of the manuscripts fully met all the requirements, the prize was equally divided between the two adjudged to be the best offered, entitled respectivly, 'Character Building,' by Edward Payson Jackson, one of the masters of the Boston Latin school, and 'The Laws of Daily Conduct.'

"Although the two books were written with no referance to each other, they seem to be, both in manner and matter, each the complement of the other. The deficiencies of each are, in great measure, supplied by the other. While 'Character Building' is analytic and cast in dialog form, the present work is more general and synthetic in its style and treatment. The two are therefore published in a single volume, as well as separately, at the earnest request of the Union, and the authors hope that the joint book will be preferred by purchasers. Much of the matter in the introduction to 'The Laws of Daily Conduct' is equally pertinent to 'Character Building.'

"The authors of both books are friends to religion, and they hav written from a deep conviction that there is a great need of instruction in morals in the public schools. Experience, however, has amply proved the inexpediency of the attempt to teach ethics there on a religious basis. Of the success of this endeavor to place the study on a scientific basis others must judge. But in a country marked by a great diversity of creeds, the way of practice is surely the one way to follow. To teachers and parents who would not neglect the main matter of human life while imparting general knowledge, I offer this volume, in the hope that it may be somewhat of an aid in moral training in the home and in the school."

Mr. Jackson's preface is in the main in the same words. Where it differs we copy it:

"The avoidance of sectarianism was not a difficulty, but a relief. Although both writers wish to be known as friends of religion, they agree in the conviction that the public school, which belongs equally to representativs of all sects and to those of no sect, is not the place for special religious or theological instruction. There is enough in what is known as morals, without admixture of a distinctiv religious creed, enough that the good, the pure, the noble, the patriotic, the philanthropic of all creeds can agree upon, to fill not one little book like this, but a library. The difficulty is, not to find material, but to select wisely from the abundance at hand.

"What use to make of the following pages each teacher must decide for himself. They may serve merely as hints as to methods, or they may supply subjects and their treatment, to be presented in such other language as shall seem best adapted to different classes of hearers. Should the teacher or parent prefer to read them in their original form, the time required for each of the Talks will be found not to vary materially from that prescribed by Dr. Dix, ten minutes, at most fifteen, of one day in each week of the school year."

Mr. Gilman's work is dedicated to the teachers of the country Mr. Jackson's to his father and mother. But—remarkable omission—there is nowhere any reference to the Freethinkers who desired such a work, or to the generous men who paid Messrs. Gilman and Jackson five hundred dollars each to write their works.

But while the omission of any mention of the men who made the work possible may be an unintentional discourtesy, the announcement by the writers that both are friends to religion and wish to be known as such is a breach of good faith. The idea was not to hav religion in the book at all, and certainly not to hav the Manual indirectly advertise and commend it. For, aside from his preface, Mr. Gilman takes pains to deny that the method is either anti-religious or anti-theological, and suggests that "parents at home, preachers in the pulpit, or teachers in the Sunday-school will supplement a distinctly scientific teaching of morals with a more religious or theological view." While Mr. Jackson's most prominent idea in his prolog is, adopting theological phraseology, that the two authorities in the world are the state and God, and that we should "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." And he further tells us, in his chapter against profanity, that a "Being" is insulted by swearing. This attempt to teach Theism should hav been stricken out by the committee, because the very conception of the book was to avoid all religious points; and certainly it was no place to teach Theism in a book paid for by a body of men of whom the majority are Atheists. It may be that the writers do not know this—if they did they would scarcely be fit to write a manual on the subject chosen—but the committee, knowing the feelings of their supporters, should hav cut the objectionable phrases out.

The general scope of the Manual is fairly well expressed in the prefaces quoted. Mr. Gilman's part is more of a statement of principles and Mr. Jackson's a detailed application. Together they form a very valuable work, marred only by a few hereditary misapplications of thought such as we hav pointed out. The book is copyrighted by the authors, published by an Eastern firm, and what the American Secular Union has to do with it now we do not know. With the religion and theology eliminated it would be admirably suited for the purpose for which it was intended.

Professor Briggs to Be Tried.

November 4th, the day after election, Professor Briggs is to be put on trial for heresy, it having been so decided by the presbytery of New York after a consideration of the charges against him formulated by the Presbytery's prosecution committee. These are the dreadful things to which the professor must reply on that date:

"Charge I. The Presbyterian church in the United States of America charges the Rev. Charles A. Briggs, D.D., being a minister of the Presbyterian church and a member of the Presbytery of New York, with teaching doctrins which conflict irreconcilably with and are contrary to the cardinal doctrin taught in the Holy Scripture and contained in the standards of the Presbyterian church, that the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the only infallible rule of faith and practice.

"These hurtful errors striking at the vitals of religion, and contrary to the regulations and practice of the Presbyterian church, were promulgated in an inaugural address which Dr. Briggs delivered at the Union Thological Seminary in the city of New York Jan. 30, 1891, on the occasion of his induction into the Edward Robinson chair of Biblical Theology, which address has, with Dr. Briggs's approval, been published and extensivly circulated and republished in a second edition with a preface and an appendix.

"Charge II. The Presbyterian church of the United States of America charges the Rev. Charles A. Briggs, D.D., being a minister in the Presbyterian church and a member of the presbytery of New York, with teaching a doctrin of the character, state, and sanctification of believers after death which irreconcilably conflicts with and is contrary to the Holy Scriptures and the standards of the Presbyterian church."

The Presbyterian church assumes that it knows what the Holy Bible contains better than any other church; and that what is contrary to Presbyterian standards of the Presbyterian church is contrary to the will, or at least the word, of God. The Catholic church assumes substantially the same position, and it used to make heresy trials much more interesting than it is possible for the Presbyterians to do now. This, however, is not the Presbyterians' fault. Mr. Calvin, one of their leaders in days agone, was a highly successful entertainer of a certain distinguished Unitarian, and his able followers made life not entirely uninteresting to Catholics.

But just at the present time this trial of Professor Briggs is a little inconsistent, unless along with him a great many more shall be clerically indicted. In fact the whole Presbytery of Pittsburgh may be included, for it has accepted and will send to the general committee, and ask the General Assembly to accept, a revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith. Other presbyteries hav and will do the same; but each member voting in the affirmativ for these revisions is a heretic as surely as is Professor Briggs, for impeaching the standards of the church.

The trouble is, the church is between the devil and the deep sea. Its members will not let it stay where it is, and it does not know how to hitch along without disjointing itself. Of the members of the Pittsburgh Presbytery, for instance, some do not believe in foreordination and predestination, but others do, and whether these dogmas are left in or out the church is divided. Again, the revision committee did not want to insist that some are elect and others will be lost, so it compromised the matter by saying that a great multitude are elect and perhaps some more. As for infant damnation, the difficulty is shown in the remark of one minister at the meeting of the presbytery: "It is very hard for me when a mother comes and asks that we sing over the body of her child, 'Safe in the Arms of Jesus.' She thinks his soul is. Yet how can we sing it when our doctrin teaches that it is not so? But what are we to understand by Christ saying, 'Suffer little children to come unto me?' What is an infant and what is a little child?" The question was dismissed with a careless, "Well, we havn't time to define that."

The Sunday Oregonian has summed up the general situation pretty well with a direct reference to the case of Professor Briggs. "It is impossible," it begins, "to stay the tide. Men in increasing numbers insist on treating religion rationally; on dealing with the Bible on ordinary principles of literary interpretation; on putting the discussion as to the origin and meaning of the scriptures and the development of religious and theological doctrins on historical grounds. More and more it is coming to be understood that the whole history of man is a regular and orderly thing, without special revelations, without miraculous interpolations of divine providence. The thought of our time is rapidly clearing religion of the crudities it borrowed from those ages in which there was no scientific observation."

The address of Dr. Vincent, a Presbyterian divine, to the students of Union Theological College, in which Dr. Briggs holds his professorship, is considered by the same clear-sighted journal to hav an important bearing on the future history of Presbyterianism. In this address Dr. Vincent made it evident that the directors and the faculty intend to support Dr. Briggs, whether the Presbyterian general assembly shall approve their course or not. From this the reviewer of the situation concludes that one part of the Presbyterian church has advanced "to a view of the Bible and inspiration not unlike that set forth by Emerson fifty years ago, namely, that the word of God is not in the scriptures alone, that his revelation did not end two thousand years ago, that the Bible in its entirety is not the infallible word, that the absolute inerrancy of the whole of its texts cannot be maintained." Dr. Vincent maintained in the address that innumerable expressions in the scriptures originated in obsolete and forgotten traits of vanished peoples, whose experience was valuable on the whole, but not infallible; that those expressions were the product of unscientific ages, and are superseded, therefore, by modern enlightenment. He contended for rational interpretation on the principles of literary criticism and historical inquiry. "I agree," he says, "with Dr. Briggs, that the scriptures must be interpreted as other human writings are interpreted." But, as he says further, "Principles of interpretation were formulated in past ages which modern exegesis can not recognize. Solomon's Song does not signify the love of Christ for the church. Yet one of the proof texts for the divine decrees in the Westminster Confession is taken from the Canticle. The time is past when the doctrin of predestination of a large part of the human race to eternal punishment can be proved by passages in the New Testament that hav no more to do with predestination than the Iliad or the Odyssey of Homer."

That this trial will split the church is believed by a great many observers. The new theological movement, which reduces the Bible to the level of other books, and thereby takes away all that makes it valuable to religion, is, says the writer referred to, "directly in line with the scholarship and progressiv thought of the age. It is part of a great movement that cannot be turned backward. If Presbyterianism pronounces against it, that church will be divided; and then those who resolve to adhere to the old course will still find themselvs assailed by the spirit of the age and unable to maintain dogmas which mankind has outgrown."

The more discussion, the more truth winnowed from the chaff and the more heresy, the more freedom. If Dr. Briggs shall be adjudged a heretic, if his college sustain him and break with the church, it advances by many years the tearing to pieces of the entire web of Christian superstition woven with so much cunning by the medicin men of the antique world.

Sunday.

The police of Baltimore hav gone wholesale into enforcing Maryland's Sunday law. Two hundred and twenty-five persons were complained against two Sundays ago, for offenses varying from cleaning carriages to selling postage stamps. The ministers of the city are responsible for the revival of the blue laws, and at their meetings persist in the attempt to enforce them. The German-American Lincoln Club, however, has adopted the following:

"WHEREAS, The so-called 'Blue Laws,' which were enacted in 1732, and which hav been again enforced through the instructions of a Democratic judge and a Democratic foreman of the grand jury, are odious to all law-abiding citizens; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we call upon all right-thinking citizens to assist us in our efforts to hav said laws repealed by supporting and voting only for such candidates for the legislature who pledge themselvs to vote for the repeal of these obnoxious laws."

The German-Americans hav struck at the root of the matter. Repeal of the Sunday laws is the only effectual remedy for the injustice of the bigots.

The Methodists at their ecumenical council held in Washington hav, on the Sunday question and the World's Fair, adopted this memorial:

"The Ecumenical Methodist conference, composed of five hundred ministers and laymen and representing the Methodist churches throughout the world, respectfully petitions your honorable body to prevent the proposed opening of the World's Columbian Exposition on the Lord's Day. We make this petition for the following reasons:

"1. It is the religious conviction of the great majority of Christian people that man needs and God commands the observance of a Sabbath.

"2. The opening of the exhibition on Sunday would violate the Sabbath-keeping traditions of the American people and their Anglo-Saxon ancestry, and also the laws of the United States and Illinois.

"3. The Columbian Exposition ought to exhibit to visitors from other lands a characteristic Christian American Sunday rather than a weekly secular holiday.

"4. The proposed opening on Sunday would deprive the thousands of employees in the service of the Exposition of their right to one day in seven for rest and worship. The same injustice would be done to many thousands in the service of the transportation companies. It would also furnish an excuse to employers for refusing to grant holidays for the purpose of visiting the Exposition which would otherwise be given to their employees.

"5. The spirit of the movement to open the Exposition on Sunday is not philanthropic, but mercenary. It is not primarily to giv the workingmen a chance to visit the Exposition, but to increase the gains of the transportation companies and others who are large stockholders in the Exposition.

"6. As an offset to the plea that the stockholders will lose money if the Exposition is not open on Sunday, we beg leave to remind you that the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia was a financial success with the gates closed on Sunday.

"7. We hav reason to believe that many of the exhibitors from Great Britain and other Christian lands will refuse to expose their exhibits on Sunday—thus rendering the Sunday exhibit very unsatisfactory to visitors and at the same time silently rebuking the mercenary spirit that would open the gates on that day."

If the Lord commanded the observance of any day, that day was Saturday. What, then, has Sunday to do with the case?

Permitting Quakers to reside in Massachusetts is also violating the traditions of the American people and permitting witches to liv is violating the traditions and outraging the spirit of our Anglo-Saxon ancestry. Why not, then, revive the laws against Quakers and witches? But the United States hav no laws forbidding an open Fair. The statement that they hav is an attempt to deceive.

Visitors from other lands incline more to laugh at our Puritanical Sunday observance than to be impressed with its desirability. If it is really desired to make a good impression upon them, the Fair should by all means be kept open.

The reasons of this ecumenical council are the frivolous quibbling of people who are working for personal objects under the guise of philanthropy.

THE Sunday Oregonian says that the only saloon-keepers who hav taken any interest in the question of closing the World's Fair on Sunday are those of Chicago, who hav arrayed themselvs with the church people in favor of closing the Fair on Sundays. If the working people of Chicago are denied admission to the fair on Sundays they will seek recreation in the open-air saloons, beer gardens and concert halls, to the financial gain of the whisky-sellers. These facts hav been published before.

THE London Freethinker says: "THE TRUTH SEEKER calls for an International Congress of Freethinkers to be held in Chicago in 1893. Will not this be a day after the World's Fair?" It would not be a day after the World's Fair, but a year after the proper four-hundreth anniversary of the discovery of America. Mr. Foote is probably not aware that the Fair was postponed a year to accommodate Chicago. The Fair is supposed to open May 4, 1893, and close Oct. 31, 1893. We hope to see it open every day between those dates.

THE London Freethinker has been enlarged from twelve to sixteen pages. With the exception of THE TRUTH SEEKER it is probably the only Freethought journal which has supported itself from its initial number, and undoubtedly Mr. Foote, like Mr. Bennett, saw some gloomy periods. And even unto this day there are probably times with it as with us when "times are hard." Mr. Foote has annexed Mr. Watts, and together they will hav little difficulty in keeping the Secular party up to its work. We shall not be surprised to see Mr. Watts, and perhaps Mr. Foote, in the British Parliament within a few years.

DR. J. M. BUCKLEY, editor of the Christian Advocate, is one of the few logical theologians now discussing the tendency of the world to get away from old religious dogmas. In a consideration of "scientific thought" at the Methodist ecumenical council the other day he said: "Science can giv no help as to the fundamental questions of religion; Christianity is as false as the wildest superstition, unless the doctrin of the immaculate conception be true." This is true, but how many preachers of any note nowadays dare affirm it? They juggle with words to hide the real facts; for if Dr. Buckley is right Infidelity has proved its point. How many intelligent people believe in the immaculate conception?

SPEAKING of Parnell's death, mountebank Talmage says: "The last forty-eight hours hav reminded me of the beautiful habit in human nature to speak well of the dead, omitting their faults and extoling their virtue. However vehemently and perhaps justly men are denounced for their principles or their behavior while they are in the battle of life, when they become exanimate anathema ceases. See how all the pens, all the types, all the tongues that were full of attack for Mr. Parnell hav become lenient if not positivly appreciativ. I think this is beautiful. As long as a man is alive he can answer back. But if when his lips are closed for the last silence you assail him the war is unequal. It is ignominious for one to attack the lifeless. It is the dead lion of the fable kicked by an ass. Whatever a man's faults when he has passed off cease your excoriation. Only swine will root up a graveyard." This applies, we suppose, to every deceased person but Thomas Paine, for of all the vilifiers of that great man since his death, none has been more despicable than the Rev. Mr. Talmage. The man who says this of Parnell has assailed the memory, the reputation, of Paine without truth or mercy. He has attacked the lifeless; he has excoriated the man after he had passed off. He has kicked the lion; he has rooted up a graveyard. And now he has fitly described himself!

MILWAUKEE is holding an Industrial Exposition, and after strong opposition from the bigots it was opened on Sunday, October 11th. The result was an attendance of nearly twenty-five thousand people. Of this enormous gathering the Sentinel says: "The crowd was not only large during the afternoon and evening, but it was a very different crowd from that usually seen in the great building. There were thousands of people who had never before passed the gates. That fact was very plain to everyone who is accustomed to visit the exposition on week-days, and it was verified by inquiries addressed to hundreds of people by Sentinel reporters. It was not only a large, but interested crowd as well. There was not the slightest doubt about that. The attendance during the afternoon was very largely made up of wage-earners and their families. They sought out, inspected and lingered around the industrial features of the exposition. Around every piece of machinery in operation there was a throng of men. They inspected every piece closely and discussed the working parts in a manner clearly indicativ of a keen interest felt and oftentimes a clear knowledge of what they were talking about. Nothing seemed to escape their observation. It was pleasure and knowledge getting combined with them, and from their conversation it was clear that many were forming new ideas; that they were seeing things that they did not know. The crowd was not all made up of men by any means. It seemed as if every man had brought his wife with him and a good many of the children along too. While the men swarmed around the industrial exhibits the women busied themselvs among the mercantil exhibits and the various novelty works in operation and the children flocked around the candy factories and popcorn booths with wide-open eyes and usually with hands full of things to their tastes. The art gallery was thronged all the afternoon and evening. It seemed as if everybody visited the art gallery. Some studied long the choicest pictures, or those which pleased them the most. Many showed a keen relish for the beautiful, while others passed through giving only a casual inspection to the great collection. In the public museum there was a great interest manifested. Everybody went in among the works of nature and inspected everything from the bird eggs to the Egyptian mummies, the big stuffed serpents and skeleton of a whale. It was evident that most of the visitors had never inspected the museum before." We commend these facts to the earnest, careful, and if need be prayerful, consideration of the managers of the World's Fair to be held in Chicago in 1893.

Letters from Friends.

Ways of Looking at the Bible.

CHEBANSE, ILL., Oct. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I like the cartoons very well. If we look upon the Bible as the production of our forefathers while they were still in a state of ignorance and barbarism, it is all very well, but if we look upon it as the production of God, or a superior being of some kind, then it is worthy of nothing but ridicule. EDWARD HAIGHT.

Said the Picture Is an Insult.

BLAINE, WASH., Sept. 28, 291.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1. To say that I liked THE TRUTH SEEKER would be putting it mild. It is the best paper I ever read. And those pictures are just the thing. I showed a good Christian the picture where the preacher was preaching to the headless congregation. He said that picture was an insult to every intelligent person. I told him that illustrated Christianity better than anything I ever saw. Wishing you and THE TRUTH SEEKER and Watson Heston a long and successful life, I am, ever your well-wisher,

J. D. NASH.

Those Demands, Which It Is Time We Were Getting.

RICHMOND, Sept. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In looking over THE TRUTH SEEKER I often see mentioned by different writers our Nine Demands. I hav yet to learn what these Nine Demands are, for none of the writers has stated what they are. Now, I wish you or some brother Liberal would inform me what they are, so that if I get hitched with some orthodox brother I can state to him our platform with all of the planks in sight and sound. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, also Heston and the pictures. Yours truly, J. C. KILGORE.

[One or more copies of the leaflet giving the Nine Demands can be had of the secretary of the American Secular Union. In a couple of weeks our report of the Secular Union Congress will contain them.—ED. T. S.]

Good-bye, God—Welcome Scientists.

STAPLES, MINN., Sept. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send a new subscriber—a Freethinker, without God or ghost, devil or dominie, to excite his fears. I wonder what the Christians think of the new science of rain-making. Think of a God who has concluded to send a rain in a certain locality—a locality usually where it is not needed—where they hav already had too much—then think of a finite being here on earth thwarting this infinit God's plans by drawing the rain off to another locality where it is needed. But that is just what the new science is going to do. The day when certain places are drowned out with floods and other places are dried up with drouths is about gone. The new science will equalize the rainfall, and every man benefited by it will be taxed for the cost. Henry George may now retire. I am in the interest of the science of rain-making—the advocate of a double tax. Good-bye, God—welcome, science! D. C. JENKINS.

Edison vs. Christ.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL., Oct. 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for my subscription, twenty-five cents for ANNUAL for 1891, seventy-five cents for Heston's pictures. I am pleased with Heston's picture on Progress, but did not see anyone hurling the Christian's hell and the Christian devil at us. A suggestion to Brother Heston, if I do not presume too much. Could you get up a description of Christ riding into Jerusalem on an ass, saying: "I didn't come to bring peace but a sword, and to set father against son and son against father, and these things hav followed my teachings all through the ages. We hav burnt Bruno and Servetus and hundreds of thousands of others at the stake. We hav hanged witches. We hav torn limb from limb with the rack. We hav murdered seven million in the war of the Crusades. All for the love of Christ. Not satisfied with that, we are going to send nine-tenths of the human family to hell to burn forever." The contrast the next week. Contrast Edison with Christ—Edison riding on an electric car holding electric wires that surround the globe and saying: "We send messages of love and friendship to all nations of the world."

JONAS SCOTT.

God Given a Lashing.

AUSTIN, TEX., Oct. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I being a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I would like to giv you a little argument I had with a Christian. He asked me if I did not think God made the world. I told him that I did not—that nature made it. He asked me who made nature. I said, nature always was. He then asked me what made me doubt that there was a God any more than a nature. I answered that we hav proof that there is a supreme power called nature, but we hav none that there is God, except a book that a fairy tale author would be proud of. Then I spoke of a piece I saw in your paper about praying. The author said he would giv a certain sum of money if all the preachers in the world could move a thimbleful of dirt or a dead fly an inch on his table by praying. My friend said that prayer should not be used that way, but if a man was in jail or going to be hanged, why, then pray and God would save him. We all know how many men hav been hanged for things they did not do, and most of them believed in a God and prayed for him to save them. Did he save them? If he is the almighty and just God they say he is and had the power to save these men and would not, would not he be a cold-blooded murderer? But that would be like some more of his noble and just acts. Think of a thing of his power telling a man what to write in a book and contradicting himself one hundred and forty-eight times ("contradictions" a nice term for lying). And think of him seeing his children starving in large cities, as we know they are, he with the power to help them and will not do it. Yet the Christians say he is a noble and merciful God. Well, if he has the power they say he has and will not help his children, as the Bible says we are, I think he is the biggest and the meanest villain I ever heard of.

Yours truly, LITTLE HELLEN.

Anti-Liquor Endeavors.

BLOOMDALE, O., Sept. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When I fired the gun, "A Scheme for Consideration," it was my intention to strike professionals of all the ilks named, and little did I think of bagging a D.D. (or Dutch Dude, as he wishes to be known). He must hav stood around too close. I will concede that some of the missils were too scattering, but it was more for a feeler to scare up the game than any intent to kill. If Mr. Blitz will tell us how he is maimed I will try and say a soothing word to heal him. He imagins that personalities are arguments, but this error deserves no answer.

Right here let me add another idea. Some natural effects hav natural causes, other natural causes hav natural effects. To illustrate, the necessity which the stomach has for stimulants givs rise to desires and appetites and the over-indulgence of these often ends in bibulation; this requires in turn people who cater to these desires or bibulous tastes, and last but not least the distiller to furnish the liquors. In this case the human desire for drink is the hole to be filled or the cause, and the handling of the liquor by the various dealers and the production of it by the distillers in all cases for the profit there is in it is the effect. To illustrate the reverse statement we will suppose a river with its mouth and all the good or evil it carries down to the end—this is the effect and its source; the wells or springs the cause. In the latter case it would be right and proper to stop the source or cause to do away with the effect. In the former it would be right and proper to stop the effect to do away with the cause. So wean or educate the people away from such tastes by furnishing substitutes, or hav them control the taste, or by heredity so constitute them that there be a lack of the taste, and you would summarily do away with the whole traffic. But never by Prohibition.

Point me out a community of people who do not bibulate and I will show you one that has no use for a regular bar or drinking-place. C. C. GERMANN.

Thinks Capitalism as Evil as Superstition.

IRWIN STATION, Aug. 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We should hav a free and fair discussion of all subjects conduciv to the welfare of mankind and their physical, mental, and moral attainments. Any method, condition, or circumstance that prohibits or perverts the opportunities of cultivating such attainments is a usurpation. We hav both the ecclesiastical and the capitalistic parties that are guilty on such a charge. It is evident from the manner in which the capitalistic party contributes to the clergy that they are both in company for the mental and financial exploitation of the masses. The clergy receive compensation of the profits accruing from their doctrin of contentedness and submission. Reference to Fathers Lambing in the coke region strike and Hickey in the Braddock strike is only necessary to convince a person of their partnership. Hence the reason of their interest in the Jew business (Jesus Christ Total Depravity Co.), that they can Jew down the wages of the poor deluded workmen to a bare subsistence (the plane of depravity) with impunity and without fear of consequences. We really need emancipation from capitalistic oppression as well as from religious oppression and superstition. Hence my reason for the discussion of all subjects.

I may as well inform the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER of an incident that occurred at a picnic held at Idlewild under the auspices of the Immaculate Conception Roman Catholic church of this place. A colored lad named Wright, also of this place, purchased a twenty-five cent ticket that entitled him to a dinner at one of the refreshment stands, and upon demand of the same a seat at the table was refused him. And he was told when he asked them to refund his money to sell his ticket to some one else in order to regain his twenty-five cents. This is evidence that a negro has no right that a Roman Catholic must recognize, which exhibits the old Inquisitorial spirit. Having said enough, I close by wishing success and prosperity to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its staff, and while I retain my reasoning faculties will remain a subscriber. WILLIAM H. THOMAS.

On Spirits, Bottled and Other.

LOS GATOS, CAL., Oct. 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am in receipt of the fourth number of your TRUTH SEEKER since Freethought ceased to be published—which I much regret for the cause—and you may depend on one steady subscriber from this place, who is willing to do whatever he can for Freethought and the advance of humanity.

Let me giv an answer to Mr. Lenhagen, of Harriman, Tenn. Circumstances made me to open a saloon, which I conduct in such a way that no man can get drunk, or to drink if he is drunk, on my premises, as I hate nothing more than a drunken person. And this is a good reason why I cannot make more with my business than a poor living. Besides the above I do not allow playing cards, dice, singing, or rough language; and this should be made a rule before granting a license to anyone that intends to keep a saloon. Freethought can do nothing for Prohibition except to try to giv as good an education to every child born as possible, and keep the children out of bad company till they are able to take care of themselvs. Good education and a little self-estimation will keep any person from getting drunk, and nothing else. Liberalism has no more to do with saloons than Christianity.

I cannot understand how Freethinkers can believe in Spiritualism; yet they do so a great deal. Now, a question to the Freethought Spiritualist. A year ago a company began boring for oil about a quarter of a mile from my place and had at a depth of one hundred feet about three barrels of oil in twenty-four hours, and then kept on till about six hundred feet, when gas was struck and oil lost entirely. The company kept on boring to eight hundred feet, when some of the stockholders consulted a medium—Mrs. Hayes—who, so the saying is, went into a trance, when the spirits told her that by boring to a certain depth the well would pay very well, but others would be opened near by that would pay better. The men bought lots of stock, and are going to bore deeper now. Is a spirit able to get down a depth of say two thousand feet and come up again through solid ground, and not hav even the smell of coal oil sticking on him? Respectfully, OTTO NEUHAUS.

God's House and Preachers.

BOYNE FALLS, Oct. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $5 for my renewal to Our Holy Bible, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and one new convert to the faith, with the promis of several others as soon as they can raise the funds. Our brother Methodists are trying to build their God another house in this place and are soliciting funds from everybody in the community except myself, and I tell them it is very strange that people are expected to pay for another house of God when we hav one and God doesn't occupy it more than two or three hours during a whole week and so many of our brethren are obliged to liv in rented houses seven days in the week and pay a big rent. I hav noticed in this community a great deal of their boasted Christian love and charity—such as one of the most prominent female members of the Methodist Episcopal church and leader of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union making an assault on an unbeliever with a water pitcher and settling for the same before a justice of the peace for $7; and a male member of the same church in good standing, leader in revival work and for years superintendent of the Sunday-school, calling upon God in prayer to break our stubborn necks for the only reason that we do not believe, and during week-days you may find him in all manner of ungodly company, such as croquet-playing, horse-racing, and obscene story-telling. Another case of cruel neglect by God of one whom he called to preach on this circuit about a year ago came to light at the conference at Grand Rapids a few weeks ago. Rev. Bushell, of this place, reported as financially embarrassed and wished to be relieved and permitted to go to work at his trade—carpenter—for two or three years. Now, if every community can do as well and start their dear pastors in search of a job we will hav accomplished a grand work. But, oh, think of this dear messenger of the Lord gathering up his kit of rusty tools and starting off on the tramp in search of a job, perhaps hiring out to some worldly-minded person, while our church is being built by two readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Truly the ways of the Lord are past finding out.

Yours for truth and justice, S. BARINGER.

Some Lies for the Glory of God.

SAMOTH, ILL., Sept. 23, E.M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: We hav been blest with a Methodist blow-out—but bear with me, I beg of you, not a single soul was allured into the snare of superstition. The pulpit-pounder who presided over the protracted powwow rendered this absurd assertion: "That magnificent man, formerly of Peoria, Ill., who sails under the appellation of 'arch Agnostic,' renounced his iconoclasm at the burial of his brother, Ebon C. Ingersoll, and confessed Christ and an implicit belief in immortal existence." A larger lie was never told for Christ's sake. And again: "Voltaire committed suicide in fear of his future fate." I also denounce this as a dirty little lie. Colonel Ingersoll in "Paine's Vindication" proffered to pay to any clergyman $1,000 in gold who would prove that Paine "died in terror because of religious opinions he had expressed, or that Voltaire did not shuffle off this mortal coil "as calmly as the coming of the dawn." Again, this Rev. (?) Ananias fastens the fangs of fear in the fleshless form of Thomas Paine: "'Tom' Paine in his fatal illness was admonished by his daughter to discard his Deistical views and accept those entertained by his wife (Christian). Ultimately he acceded to her persistent entreaty and died in fear, exclaiming, 'All is dark.'"

Now let us analyze the utterances of this advocate of "sacred smut." Up to date I am lingering under the impression that Thomas Paine did not possess any daughters. All the accounts I hav perused concerning his career describe him as being childless. Furthermore, at the epoch of his dissolution he was separated from his spouse. Well, we should be lenient on these "lying prophets," because Jehovah said he would put "lying spirits into their mouths." Colonel Ingersoll does not absolutely deny or affirm an existence "over yonder," and simply says, "Help for the living and hope for the dead." He postulates and proves that a finite cannot fathom the infinit.

Men nowadays are beginning to doubt the beautiful fable of Jonah and the "big fish"—men who cross the dead line of the majority, though the heavens should fall. Is Joshua's jugglery of lassooing that luminous orb which emits from her eternal quiver the arrows of day, implicitly relied on as inspiration except by the "gentleman in the dugout?"

Jehovah, it appears from "holy writ" (holy rot), has an inflexible hankering to make himself an obscure object; that is our inference from the following information: "In the thickest of darkness shall be my hiding-place." Pleasant place for an omnipresent person, isn't it?

The book of books (?) givs us a meek monition thus: "I say unto you, resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek turn to him the other also." It is a demonstrated fact daily that this is a pretty precept to preach from but not to practice. The countless internecine wars of contending countries where the Bible is regarded as the paramount code of ethics are positiv proof of this postulate.

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. v, 5). The above is an exact expression of ecclesiasticism. The faithful followers of the "meek and lowly" hav in trumpet tones executed the above to the letter. Those "meek" and credulous children of the cross in order to "inherit the earth" hav saturated the ground with human gore; they hav transformed happy homes into veritable hells; they hav been instrumental in causing all the grievances which befall human beings. The above is the key-note to the wails of the widow and the plea of the pauper. With all these crimes confronting them they still persist in putting their imaginary God in our godless Constitution, and thereby usurping the inalienable immunities of the citizen.

O thou benighted Christian! is this your conception of a God of infinit mercy and justice-loving: "And he turned back and looked on them and cursed them in the name of the Lord. And there came forth two she bears out of the wood and tare forty and two children of them." What provoked this old lickspittle Elisha to perform with his menagerie in the name of the Lord on those dimpled darlings? The account informs us it was because they poked fun at God's vicar, who was short of the article of hair.

There are eighty thousand of these lazy leeches throughout this domain who still with tremendous tenacity thresh this old theologic straw containing over thirty thousand discrepancies, "and endless time-worn, moss-grown, weather-beaten, and worm-eaten" follies, which is despised on the broad fields of science, with her bright crop of golden grain gleaming and rustling to the balmy breezes, product of thinkers who hav won their accolade in intellectual achievements on the highway of progress far away from the slough of superstition and Moses and the bullfrogs.

"Religions are like fireflies—they require darkness in order to shine," says Schopenhauer superbly. Yes, our comments are that orthodoxy reminds us of an "owl perched on a decayed limb of the tree of knowledge," breaking the dismal desert of solitude with his sepulchral, hypocritical hoot; while the eagle of heterodoxy sublimely soars in the shimmering sky and serenely pierces the clouds with tireless pinion.

When we contemplate the splendid story of Samson losing his herculean strength by having his hair sheared off we smile out aloud. We who cultivate "intellectual hospitality" consider this in the light and bearing of the nineteenth century as a capital chestnut. "What fools these mortals be!" to believe in such infamous lies.

I am not a Christian for the plausible reason that Christianity renounces the sacred relation of the fireside. Christianity severs the tender tie, which is as holy as happiness and sacred as sunshine. I am an ardent advocate of the fidelity to duty, the free democracy (in a social sense) and felicity of the family. A stanza from Burns beautifully depicts a democracy of good government:

To make a happy fireside clime
For weans and wife,
Is the true pathos and sublime
Of human life.

I desire to express my admiration for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like its tenor. Yours for love, liberty, and law,

REV. CHARLES D. MCBRIDE.

Challenge to the Men in the Cowards' Castles.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: On coming along East Main street, this city, last Sunday evening, I heard a parson holding forth in South Water street. Ever ready for the fray, I went and listened to his bosh till he had finished. Then I think either his devil or his God must hav prompted him; at any rate, he came and asked me if I was "saved." O ye gods and little fishes! It was just the very thing I was wanting. Well, I had the best twenty minutes I ever had in my life. I turned his own guns against him, and if the voice of about one hundred or more who were standing round is anything to go by, I fairly doubled the gentleman up, for they continually shouted, "Go in, young fellow, you've got him!" "Hear, hear!" "Oh, you're too much for him!" Well, I am sure his friends wished that he was at home with his mother, and finally one got each side of him and led him away, while I (forgiv me for feeling a trifle vain, will you!) was greeted with such cries as "Good boy!" "I am with you," etc., etc. My opponent asked me one question, and it is the only one that I can remember, which I hav answered in the following letter. He gave me his address, but not his name, before he left, and asked me to call on him to hav a discussion. In the heat of the moment I said I would do so, but on thinking it over, I find I committed an error, for why should I go behind closed doors to discuss religion, as I prefer to do it in public? I hav sent him a copy of the following inclosed letter and challenge. I shall feel much obliged to you if you can find space for it in your valuable paper. I want to find out if Jesus has any champions in this tight little city. I hav not been here very long, and hav no friends and very few acquaintances, but if I stay here I hav faith larger than a grain of mustard-seed that there will be a branch of the Secular Union formed right here in this city. I can see a wide field for Secularists here. I hav to labor hard ten hours a day for my bread, but still will try to contribute a mite now and then. The following is a true copy of the letter I hav sent to Mr. parson. You shall know whether he has courage enough to champion his cause or not.

41 MORTIMER ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y., Aug. 31, 1891.

To MR. ——, 386 Troop St., Rochester, N. Y.

Dear Sir: It is with the greatest reluctance that I forego the promis I made you last night, viz., that of visiting you at your own house to discuss religion. (I state my reason later on.) In this letter I intend to avoid all personalities. I shall aim against no particular sect, but against them all generally. Now, sir, the only straight question I consider you asked me last night was, "How shall I stand before God?" Well, that is a great, big, wide question, which I will pay a little attention to. My answer last night was, "I hav no idea that I shall ever hav to stand before one." There are gods many, and lords many. In your question I presume you mean the Christian God—your God whom you bully and coax by turns. I suppose you mean the God "whom no man hath seen at any time" (vide New Testament), and yet it would be the same God whom Moses spoke with "face to face" and whose "back parts" Moses also saw. And I believe (I hav not a Bible by me just now—but must get one—but will giv Bible passages as near as possible from memory) it is in Genesis xxix where Jacob says, "Let us call this place Beth-el [or some such name], for we hav this day seen the Lord God face to face." Well, I will take it for granted this is the God you mean, whom your Bible calls a "consuming fire," and in another place a "God of love." Well, this Bible God played some queer pranks, truly. Your book tells us where he caused "hemorrhoids in the back parts" of an army so that his chosen could overtake them. He permits Lot to go on his way rejoicing after debauching his two daughters. David is "the man after God's own heart," although he does commit adultery with Mrs. Uriah, and causes the death of Mr. Uriah. God endows Solomon with extraordinary wisdom, although he does keep a thousand women, and causes his brother to be put to death because he dares to ask for one. We see him commanding General Joshua to slay helpless women and innocent children; later on we see him in the shape of Jesus Christ ("I and my Father are one," "In the beginning was the Word"—see Testament—must be the same fellow) blessing little children. We see him teaching the Israelites how to make spoons; burning cities; causing a deluge; making worlds, sun, moon, and stars; walking with Enoch (which won the walking match we are not told, as your Bible simply tells us "Enoch walked with God)." We see him killing all the cattle of the Egyptians about seven times (see Exodus). And after all these mighty works, we see him descend to the level of the common conjuror—that of turning water into wine. But why keep on? This is the God you mean when you ask me how I shall stand before him. Well, are you sure he is alive to-day? You hav no proofs that he is. Moses says he saw him. At least, some one says it for him, for I can prove Moses did not write the books ascribed to him. Well, some one says Moses saw him, and spoke with him—not through the telephone, oh, no, but—face to face. But what proof hav we of this? Some one says Moses did, but there were thousands of people on the earth besides Moses, and was it such a small event, this visit of the maker of worlds, that one short verse is all the news we get, while it takes a whole newspaper to describe the four-foot English queen when she goes only from one country to another, while only Moses sees God? Why, suppose he was to land right here in Rochester, we should hav the whole world to see him. And suppose we caught him and confined him in a box, as the Israelites did, and opened a show, what a trade we could do!

Well, after all this argument we will suppose there is a God such as you speak of, that Moses did see him, that he is alive now. We will suppose this, I say: How shall I stand before him? Well, I really cannot tell you. If he is a consuming fire he would naturally consume me. Another thing, you did not say whether I should hav to stand in the flesh or in the spirit. We will suppose the flesh. Where is that flesh, bone, blood, and sinew coming from? Supposing I lost a leg in Egypt and my body was buried in Rochester, should I hav to go to Egypt for the lost member to stand on? Suppose a man was washed overboard who belonged to Columbus's fleet when he was on his voyage of discovery to this country; a shoal of fish happen to be going by and they eat the body; the fish are caught by fishermen who eat them; the fishermen get drowned and they are eaten by more fish; those fish are caught and eaten. At your great judgment day can you please inform me how No. 1 man is going to "stand before God?" Where is he coming from? Aye, where? As well might I tell you to get enough building material to build a house; after you hav completed your job I say, "I hav changed my mind and will build a hospital with that material, so pull the house down again and proceed;" on completion of the hospital I hav it pulled down again and built into a church, but after that is finished I say, "Now pull that church down and build another church—same size—a hospital, and a house." You stand aghast and ask where you are to get the material from, and if I tell you there is enough material for all three you will pronounce me crazy, and properly too. The same argument applies to the men and the fish. "How can they stand before God?" I hav no doubt you will bring your Bible to your rescue. You say God has opened your eyes so you can understand it. I cannot, and if you can I am willing to be taught. But according to my present dull understanding I feel convinced I shall not be able to stand, through a want of pedal extremities. You cannot get off by saying we rise in the spirit and "stand" in the spirit, because you never saw a spirit, neither did your father or grandfather before you. Supposing there are spirits and we "stand" in that form, legs and wings and all, where are we going to "stand before God?" This small planet would not afford half enough standing-room for the billions upon billions who would hav to "stand." And if we tried to stand in space, surely the force of gravity which brings everything unsupported to the earth would bring us all down and we should form one indistinguishable mass. But for the time I will set aside all impossibilities—for I fancy I hear you saying "nothing is impossible to God"—and suppose it is possible to rise again in some form. Why, even then need I fear your God? You Christians tell me he made me, he endowed me with power to think and reason for myself; is he going to damn me for using what he has given me if I use it after the way I feel convinced is right? A man can not make himself believe anything. If a man stood over me with a loaded revolver and told me if I did not swear that two blacks made one white he would blow my brains out, I might perhaps make a hypocrit and a liar of myself, just to save my life, and giv in to him, but in my heart I should not believe it. It is the same with the hell-fire and brimstone business to-day. Thousands who say they believe it do so through fear. They are afraid to make a bold stand and examin their hearts to see whether it is a firm conviction there or not. The more I think of it, the more I study it, the more impossible it seems to me. Can your God damn me for being honest? Well, I say right here to-night (and I hav no doubt this will be published to the world) that I, George Henry, do not believe in your God. I do not, I cannot believe I shall hav to stand before him. I do not believe in your heaven, where murderers wear poultry attachments. Neither do I believe that I or any of my brothers and sisters who are trying to free this world of superstition and priestcraft, and are acting according to the reason nature has endowed us with, will be burnt in your fire and brimstone. I had a mother pure as the snow. If there is a heaven where really good people go she is there. Is your God going to be so barbarous as to throw me into hell and then make it possible for my mother to enjoy eternal bliss whilst she is able to watch her idolized boy writhing in eternal torment? Away with such trash. Your God is a monster, merciless, cruel, tyrannical, and unjust.

But, fie on you! your God is only invented by yourselvs. He is invented by the same people who invented the remainder of your stock in trade to traffic on the credulity of the ignorant and superstitious. The time is coming—it will be a long time, I know, for religion will die a lingering death, but nevertheless the time is coming—when your Holy Ghost business will come crash. As a sign of the times, not many years ago it would not hav paid me to hav held your religion and your Bible up to ridicule as I did on Sunday night. As another sign of the times, as I was going quietly home after you left me, a young, well-dressed fellow, barely out of his teens, accosted me and said he admired the way I had handled you about the Bible. He said he had been brought up to go to Sunday-school but somehow since he advanced in years and read, and studied the Bible and the Christian religion, it seemed very queer to him, and the more he read of the Bible the less a Christian he became. Now, do you think I told that man to burn his Bible? Decidedly not. I told him to read it and study it, and then ask himself the question, was it the work of a just and holy God? I said: "Don't be a Freethinker because I am. If you would see the signs of the downfall of your myth and mystery, get into conversation with twenty factory hands or laborers—about one will be religious; four will be undecided and won't know what they are; ten will be fellows who are indifferent and who hav no belief and attend no church and tell you life is too short to trouble about more than one world at once; the other five will be Freethinkers of a more or less pronounced type."

Sir, if all the nothingarians, all the indifferentists, and all the Freethinkers hot and cold were to join in one tremendous whole you could shut up your churches to-morrow, you could turn your chapels into halls of science. And from that time the world would get better. Men would love each other and look upon each other as brothers laboring for the common good. What is it now? What has it been ever since your religion gained the sway? What has caused more bloodshed, more desolation, than religion, backed up by the Bible? The drunkard and temperance spouter can both back themselvs with the Bible. Even the murderer fancies he has committed no sin, and is therefore entitled to a ticket for paradise, when the Bible is brought into his condemned cell. For, why, can he not read of even worse crimes than murderer Almy's, of Hanover, N. H.? Can we not also read of a just God who "will visit the sins of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation," and "who sets the children's teeth on edge because the fathers hav eaten sour grapes?" Even supposing your God was a reality, I should not feel afraid to "stand before him," because he has committed fouler crimes than I ever dare think of. It would be a case of "physician heal thyself."

I hav answered the only real question you asked me Sunday, and the reason I did not come to your house as I promised was this: I thought that if you and I argued all night in private it would answer no purpose. Ten to one you would not alter your belief and I can answer for myself. We should make no convert to either side, for the very simple reason there would be no one to listen to us. But to disabuse your mind in case you think I am afraid of you, I hereby throw out a CHALLENGE.

I hav no hope of any reward, because I do not believe in rewards or punishments after this life. You hav a hope of reward, of eternal bliss, of "white wings," crown, mansion, etc., etc. Now, if you want to champion your cause, to speak a good word for your God and for your Bible, and maybe win some converts, I hereby challenge you to one, two, or more nights' on some question related to religion or the Bible, which shall be agreed on later, in your own chapel or any other place you choose. I propose some handbills be printed, a nominal charge be made for admission, and after all expenses are paid one-quarter of the remainder go to the Christian cause, one-quarter to the Freethought cause, and the other half be given to some charitable institution in this city. In my throwing out this challenge do not think I am backed by a lot of champions, because I am nearly a stranger in this city, having only been here two months. I hav not a friend or a relativ here, whilst you, I presume, hav all these things I lack, so I consider everything is in your favor.

PUBLIC DEBATE

I am a Freethinker to the backbone and hav been for six years, and in that time hav suffered for my opinions more than once. Christians and their Bible made me a Freethinker, and if when I come to die I find I hav made a mistake and after all do hav to "stand before God," then I will own my mistake like a man, and if he damns me for making a mistake he will show himself to be the fiend your book represents him to be.

Yours, etc., for the downfall of superstition and the emancipation of mankind, GEORGE HENRY.

P.S.—I hope you will let me hear from you as early as possible. I am sending a copy of this to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which paper is circulated in Rochester, and shall also inform that paper whether you take up my challenge or not, so even your own friends and townsfolk will know whether you "dare to be a Daniel." Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"Toodles."

My Toodles is my poodle, but for fun we call him "Sin;"
Sinful? Yes, he's brimful; though we think the world of him;
Mischievous with all of us, and as cunning as can be,
His little pranks are full of thanks, his pettings full of glee.
His downy hair would well compare with anything that's white,
His eyes are blue and just as true as nature made them bright;
"Sin's" nose is red, it should be said, the pigment was innate,
And not from any one or many things he drank or ate.
Those teeth and tongue—for one so young—hav charms (I'll draw it mild)
Can't be excelled, and I'm compelled to love him as a child!
And he loves me, as one might see by watchings at the gate,
Or at his will the window-sill, a wonted place, will take,
And watch for hours, 'mid fragrant flowers, and often look in vain,
But still will vie, and often hie his nose against the pane.
His cunning feats he oft repeats with hoops, and balls, and stairs,
And baskets, pails, and never fails to balance on the chairs.
He'll often prance, and leap, and dance on two legs as on four,
And sit upright, as if he might all normal ways ignore.
Sinful Toodles, though my poodle, will sometimes steal and lie,
Intriguing off the table doff, of viands on the sly;
And when accused he feels abused, indignant as a man,
He shakes his head, by which is said, "It was the black-and-tan."
But when the lie he can't deny he'll then evade a row,
And look at you as if you knew and simply make a bow.
My Sin, my poodle, ah! my Toodle, I love beyond control;
I must believe he'd not deceive if he had not a soul.

Relics of the Indians.

The writer resides near the eastern border of Kansas, but a few miles from the Missouri river, whose shores are lined with a succession of rugged yet picturesque bluffs, many of them being covered with large forest trees among which the Indians once found refuge from the early white settlers. The settlers drove the Indians from the prairie lands and they fled in confusion to the banks of the big muddy, where they settled again.

Many traces of red men are yet to be found along this rugged stream; such as burying-grounds, indications of old camps, workshops, etc. There is an old Indian burying-ground located on the stream called Walnut Creek, which flows into the Missouri, where greenstone hatchets of superior finish were discovered, and now in possession of your correspondent. The latter visited this burying place afterwards and made some excavations, but turned up nothing more than Indian bones, these evidently having been covered for a long stretch of years. He subsequently learned that exploration had been in the same place thirteen years previously, and that some valuable relics were unearthed, among them a tomahawk, an ax, and a large quantity of beads. There are indications of other interments here and further examination is contemplated in the near future. The writer has personally found a number of interesting arrowheads in the same locality.

Along the river, careful search was rewarded by the finding of a most rare specimen of war club head, a flint hatchet, and in some cases some unusually fine spearheads.

About eight miles down the river from the writer's abode is a small town called Kickapo, after the Kickapo Indians, who one time had a large settlement there. Near the place are several Indian burying-grounds, and the first excavator will without question secure a number of relics. A visit to the locality, in view of activ exploration, is being arranged for. If the undertaking should prove as successful as expected, some of the details will be given to the Companion readers.—George J. Remsburg, in Moral and Scientific Companion, Florence, Aris.

Why the Leaves Turn.

"Probably not one person in a thousand knows why leaves change their color in the fall," remarked an eminent botanist the other day. "The common and old-fashioned idea is that all this red and golden glory we see now is caused by frosts. A true and scientific explanation of the causes of the coloring of leaves would necessitate a long and intricate discussion. Stated briefly and in proper language, those causes are these: The green matter in the tissue of a leaf is composed of two colors, red and blue. When the sap ceases to flow in the fall, and the natural growth of the tree ceases, oxidation of the tissue takes place. Under certain conditions the green of the leaf changes to red; under different conditions it takes on a yellow or brown tint. This difference in color is due to the difference in combination of the original constituents of the green tissue, and to the varying conditions of climate, exposure and soil. A dry, cold climate produces more brilliant foliage than one that is damp and warm. This is the reason that our American autumns are so much more gorgeous than those of England. There are several things about leaves that even science cannot explain. For instance, why one of two trees growing side by side, of the same age and having the same exposure, should take on a brilliant red in the fall and the other should turn yellow; or why one branch of a tree should be highly colored and the rest of the tree hav only a yellow tint, are questions that are as impossible to answer as why one member of a family should be perfectly healthy and another sickly. Maples and oaks hav the brightest colors."—Field and Forest.

Blown Full of Pins.

A man weighing three hundred pounds and as round as a football ran screaming from the dye house at 2,546 Cottage Grove avenue yesterday morning. His form glistened like steel as he rushed to the drug-store at 26th street and Cottage Grove avenue. His rotund form was completely covered with pins, which were sticking deep in every portion of his anatomy.

"Get a tack-hammer and pull these pins out quick!" shouted the fat man, who was Henry Wing.

Then he told how the boiler head in the dye-house of which he is the proprietor had blown out and scattered a box of pins standing near with such force that he was literally stuck full of them from head to foot, giving him the appearance of an animated pincushion. The clerk went to work as if he were pulling tacks, and managed to extract several papers of pins from the fat man's body. At each pull of the hammer Wing uttered a groan of anguish. Finally the last tormentor was extracted and the sufferer breathed easier.

Helping the Donkey.

The late Emperor Frederick, when he was crown-prince, while walking in the woods near the palace at Potsdam one morning, perceived an old milkwoman who was pounding the ass attached to her milk wagon and talking in an excited tone to the balky animal.

"What's the matter, my good woman?" asked the prince.

"I am in a great hurry to serve my customers with milk," replied the old woman, who did not know the prince, "and this accursed brute refuses to budge; but if you would be kind enough to pull him by the ears while I warm him up behind with this club he will go right along."

The good-natured prince seized the animal by the ears and tugged away while the old woman mauled the brute with her cudgel. Sure enough the donkey trotted on, much to the joy of the woman.

When the prince told his mother about it she rebuked him for being so familiar with the lower orders, whereupon the prince laughingly replied, "My father has helped many a donkey along at court."

Correspondence.

LEXINGTON, KY., Oct. 7, 1891.

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: Seth, Jane and the raven walked peaceably down a sunny lane, where they met an old lady of pleasant appearance. She took Jane by the hand, saying, "Come, my little lamb, let us go to the house of God and worship." Though a sermon never does me much good unless the word "Mesopotamia" occurs in it several times. Our clergyman calls sometimes to see me and I always make his coffee so sweet that he is unable to drink it. He is such a holy man.

They entered the church just as the preacher addressed them in the following manner: "And now, will the good Lord please to remember that we are a progressiv people here and hurry up the conversions on hand. Here is Julia Larcum taking the combs from her hair—perhaps she will hav the power." And then rolling up his sleeves, he exclaimed: "Now comes the rousement. I hav reached the rhetorical place for waking people up and making them cry." And then came a storm of allusions to the dead friends of the congregation, so that the raven beat a hasty retreat. He had just lost a dear, glossy brother. These birds are known to use language more profane than pathetic. Our hero formed no exception to the general rule.

As they made their way out into the lonely lane, where the sweet scent from the meadows weighed down the wandering breeze, a pious millionaire met a ragged, starving old lady, eighty years of age. As they shook hands cordially, she remarked that her health was poor, when he fairly shouted, "Oh, you look well, you are well enough (a fact), now don't complain. I hav spent the summer so delightfully, vivifying and recuperating. Good morning; let us both go to work."

Our party was hungry, too. They expected no food until the next week, although they had worked for it. So amid the general gormandizing, they were left to starve. Blessed is the man who considereth the poor; the Lord will remember him in the day of trouble.

ALHAZA.

WESTMINSTER, CAL., Oct. 5, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. I enjoy reading the children's letters very much, and I thought I would like to be a writer for the Corner. I am now going to school. Our teacher's name is Mr. Barnes; I like him very much. I very seldom see a letter from California. Papa said that he would like to write once more to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but his eyes hav been troubling him some lately, so that he could not even read the papers. So he gets my sister and I to read to him.

We liv near the coast. It is a beautiful place.

There are eight of us in family, five girls and three boys. I am the third to the oldest. We hav jolly times riding on horseback and going to the beach

If this letter escapes the waste-basket, I will try again. Your Liberal friend,

PEARL MARTIN.

WESTMINSTER, CAL., Oct. 3, 1891.

MISS WIXON, Friend and Teacher: This will be my second letter to the Corner.

I hav not written to the Corner for so long a time I think you hav forgotten me. Our school has begun and I hav been going steady all the time. Our teacher is religious. He said he would like to pray but he could not.

Only three of our pupils are religious. My father gave a lecture two weeks ago. The subject of it was, "Free Trade or Protectiv Tariff." My mother went to the mountains for her health. We had our baby brother's picture taken not a very short time ago. My schoolmate and I are going to Santa Anna. It is eight miles from our ranch. We liv on the branch three miles from the ocean and can see the steamers come in. We hav a pretty view all around. On the east is a large slew the Santa Anna empties in. There are lots of wild ducks and geese also. My oldest brother goes hunting quite often.

Wishing you success, I remain as ever,

Your friend, EUNICE MARTIN.

[We are pleased to hear from Pearl and Eunice, and hope they will write oftener.—ED. C. C.]

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 25 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Life. A Prose Poem. Printed in colors on board, beveled gilt edges. 50 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

On the 11th a revolt broke out in Uruguay, but was suppressed and fifty-three rebels were shot. The rebels had hired twenty Sicilian assassins to kill the president. The government accuses the clergy of being the main inciters.

Leo XIII. says: "We notice with pleasure that the leaders of important industries hav already studied the application of our encyclical, and that governments also hav not been indifferent to it."

A new anti-papal paper, the Araldo, will appear at Rome, and energetically assail the papacy at every point.

Germans in Russia, who are Lutherans, hav been ordered to submit plans for their churches to officials, who change them so as to raise the cost from $300 to $3,000, which prevents their being built.

Kempster and Shulters, special commissioners sent from this country to London to examin as to our immigration, say that less than half the truth has been told on Russia's persecution of the Jews. They are preparing a document on it.

Dr. O'Dwyer, one of the Irish prelates who hav held two private political conferences, condemned the opposition to Parnell shown by the clergy, and urged that they confine themselvs to their religious duties. He threatened to complain to Rome if they continued their factional fight.

French bishops hav been directed to report to Rome the growth of Socialism in thei dioceses.

The new chief rabbi of France urges Jews to love the republic, as the first government that has granted them liberty and civil rights.

At Columbia, S. C., in sentencing ten negro murderers Judge Hudson commented on the habit of negroes to select religious meetings as times for deeds of blood.

Moncure D. Conway says that Madam Blavatsky confessed to him that Theosophy is a humbug, saying, "It is a glamor; people think they see what they do not see. That is the whole of it."

The bishop of Manchester, Eng., at the Church Congress spoke for maintenance of the establishment and endowment of the Church in Wales and declared that "free trade in religion is not suited to the dispositions and circumstances of mankind."

When a charitable society found work in Connecticut for the grown sons of a large Hebrew family, the father refused, saying, "I will not go there, because I might not be able to get kosher meat"—that is, meat blessed and prepared in a certain way by a rabbi.

Gladstone has given his opinion on miracles, writing to Rev. Mr. Belcher: "I hav only yesterday become acquainted with your kindness in sending me your very interesting work on 'Miracles of Healing.' I am afraid the objections to demoniacal possession involve in germ the rejection of all belief in the supernatural. I hav read with great profit your account of the Gadara miracle."

A cardinal at Rome says the Vatican is convinced that the late disorders at Rome precipitated by French pilgrims were really instigated by the Italian government, which has become jealous of the growing influence of the pope and the amicable relations which exist between France and the Vatican. The cardinal declared that the Italian government would prefer the assassination or the expulsion of the pope to the present situation. The pope himself had recently said: "I am no longer a prisoner, but a hostage menaced with expulsion or assassination unless I capitulate before the enemy." The cardinal, continuing, said that the pope would never accept the present situation, but nothing has as yet been decided upon in the matter of his leaving Rome. The conclave is abroad, and many of the cardinals hav hitherto been reluctant to act in this matter, but they hav greatly modified their views since the French pilgrim disorders. The latter may hav the gravest consequence for Italy and the Vatican and the general situation, and perhaps seriously alter the relations between all the European powers and the Vatican.

Gems of Thought.

The origin of religious opinions is generally dated from the time when savage nations were yet in infancy. It was to gross, ignorant, and stupid people that the founders of religion hav addressed themselvs when they wished to giv them their Gods, their mode of worship, their mythology, their marvelous and frightful fables.—D'Holbach.

Doubt is the father of knowledge.—Robert C. Adams.

No man who will take liberty from another, is great enough to enjoy liberty himself.—Ingersoll.

Every man who searches for truth must incur the danger of being persecuted.—Voltaire.

Had not such men as Roger Bacon and his long line of successors been thwarted by theological authority—had not such men as Thomas Aquinas, Vincent de Beauvais, and Albert the Great been drawn or driven from the paths of science into the dark, tortuous paths of theology, leading nowhither, the world today, at the end of the nineteenth century, would hav arrived at the solution of great problems and the enjoyment of great results which will only be reached at the end of the twentieth century, and even in generations more remote. Diseases like pulmonary consumption, scarlet fever, diphtheria, pneumonia, and la grippe, which now carry off so many most precious lives, would hav long since ceased to scourge the world.—Prof. A. D. White.

THE LORD MAKETH SOME INQUIRIES OF SATAN.

And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.—Job i, 7.

O Lord, there are one or two other trifles I should like to draw your attention to if you hav a moment to spare for such worms of the dust as I am. Up to this time I hav had no intimation that I bore you, and so I am encouraged to proceed. If my questions teased you, you could soon giv me a hint to stop. . . . Or, if you liked to take a gentler way of letting me know I was a nuisance, you could, O Lord, gently drop one of Sarah's slippers down upon my head. with a pretty little scented note inside it:

To Saladin, with Jehovah's compliments: J. will answer S. all his questions when he comes to heaven.

That would be quite enough. I should build up my Ebenezer and set the slipper on the top of it, and say: "Thus far hath the Lord holpen me." You may possibly deem it a trifle presumptuous on my part to ask questions at such an august three-in-one puzzle as you are. I should not hav the boldness to trouble you, O Lord, if you would giv any of your servants the brains to answer me. I should never trouble the peer to giv me, personally, information I could hav from his flunkey. But your flunkeys, O Lord, are stone-blind leaders of the blind. I can get no answers there, and so I came direct to you. Their business is to make their living by canting about your book to the unquestioning herd, and they would rather take a toad by the nose than attempt to answer such questions as I put. I asked one of your servants the other day . . . if he would be good enough to furnish me with anything approaching valid historical proof that that son of yours ever tramped the country preaching till he ultimately got nailed to two sticks. I expected to hear of evidence from Tacitus, Suetonius, Josephus, et hoc genus. But that servant of yours with the red face and the white tie, simply laid his hand on his heart, or his stomach (I am not physiologist enough to say exactly which), and, turning up his eyes, the way a duck does in a thunderstorm, observed, "My evidence is here." It was clear to me that the evidence lay somewhere in his intestins. That may be all very well for him. You may hav constructed him so that he has evidence of the crucifixion in his hepatic artery, corroboration of the atonement in the splenic veins, and proof of the resurrection in his gastric juice. But you hav not constructed me on that accommodating plan, O Lord. My internal arrangements hav evidently been contrived to digest and assimilate food. When I ask them about you, they are dumb; when I ask them about your son Jesus, they know nothing about him. When historical proofs hav to be examined, I hav to use my head, such as it is. I never found my liver of any use in such investigations, and the soles of my feet I hav not yet tried. They are not easily got at; but I will hav them thoroughly examined if you will giv me a hint that on them I am likely to "find Jesus."—Saladin.

LET THE GHOSTS GO.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE is nothing, says a Calcutta letter, a Brahmin detests more than an attack upon his religion. Even if you convince him that a certain law or practice works evil, he will listen to no suggestion of replacing it with a new one.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL is to be the chief orator at the coming great cotton and corn fair in Texas. Knowing Shakspere as well as he does, Colonel Ingersoll can talk sensibly and eloquently on almost any subject.—Sun.

A RUSSIAN press censor permitted the following item to appear in a Moscow paper: "It is our opinion that Russia needs new railroads and will hav them." For this the censor was suspended for three months, and the editor fined £90.

THIRTY-TWO millions of Russian peasants on the verge of starvation! What if the czar should organize them into a great army and precipitate them on Europe and Asia in search of food? That would be a new irruption of the Vandals for which Christendom is not prepared.

THE Bakers' Assembly 5,296 Knights of Labor, of Boston, hav resolved to ask the next legislature of Massachusetts to enact a law prohibiting the opening of bake-shops on Sunday, and a committee was instructed to present the matter to the general court and to conduct, during the next few months, a vigorous campaign in favor of Sunday closing. The members of the assembly will, it is stated, request all labor organizations to assist them in this work.

"OH, Mr. Martin!" exclaimed some sweet girl graduates, who overtook Homer Martin in a leafy lane one Sunday morning, when he was on his way to a trout pond, "are you not going to church?" "No, I am not going to church," he replied. "Do you not like to go to church?" they inquired. "Oh, yes, my dears," rejoined the artist, "I am very fond of going to church, but I know how to restrain myself."

IT isn't often that the sermon of a preacher of the gospel has to be expurgated before it can be printed in decent newspapers, but that seems to be the case with the kind of gospel that is being preached by Sam Jones of late. His eccentricities and vulgarities get pretty low down occasionally nowadays, and a good many earnest Christians hav come to the conclusion that Brother Jones's sermons do more harm than good.—Boston Herald.

THERE is no such thing as the "Jewish vote." The American Jew who votes as a Jew and not as an American is not worthy the name of either American or Jew. We want no Jewish mayors, or Catholic governors, or Protestant senators. Politics and religion should forever remain separate, and the man who seeks to connect them is an enemy of the religion he professes to represent and of the public weal.—Jewish Tidings.

IN this city not long ago I met a pedagog who at once told me that he was engaged in writing the life of Tom Paine. Soon afterward I met a literary man, who said he had just finished the work of writing the history of Tom Paine. So it appears that there are to be two new American biographies of the author of "The Rights of Man," to whom the state of New York gave a homestead in New Rochelle, and whose bones were taken from there to England seventy years ago. About ten biographies of him hav already been published. —Sun.

AMID all the humiliating annoyances of life caused by ignorance and superstition—amid the din of senseless wrangling over paltry things, and the brawling of mistaken enthusiasts over inherited delusions, there is one ever-present, all-potent comfort, with which men of sense may regale themselvs. Enthroned with imperishable strength and purity, far above the swamps and quagmires, the miasma and fogs of driveling formularies, sits majestic Science, in whose hands are held the key of all knowledge, wisdom, and true morality.—The Jury.

THE Rev. Dr. Charles Fluhrer was invited to attend a meeting of pastors assembled at Grand Rapids to formulate a protest against keeping the World's Fair open on Sunday. After listening to several long speeches against Sabbath desecration he arose and observed that the meeting was rather lifeless, and then proceeded to make a strong plea for opening, not only the Exposition, but all museums, art galleries, and libraries on Sunday. He said the influences of these places were all refining, elevating, and educational, and that the rapidly increasing element whose only day of rest was Sunday was entitled to some consideration in matters of recreation and pleasure.

THE mayor of Atlanta, Ga., allowed the street-car company to repair their road Sunday by taking up a portion of the old track and laying down new, and the clergy raised a great howl over such a desecration of the holy Sabbath. The pious people of Atlanta say they will see that the mayor and every laborer on the work is indicted. The funny thing about the affair is, says the Denison Gazetteer, that the Prohibitionists and those booming Puritanical enactments elected him mayor, and the first Sunday after his induction into office he so zealously enforced an antiquated Sunday law he raked up, that the switching of trains was stopped, the selling of cigars and soda water prohibited, and no meat could be sold by the butchers nor bread by the bakers.

RUSSIAN usurers and small traders are going about trading upon the misery of the peasants, buying hair from the heads of poor girls for a few shillings and stripping houses of every portable article for next to nothing. In two or three cases the ferment of disorder which is seething under the terrible surface has broken out in riots directed against the Jews. Doubtless there will be more than melancholy aggravations of Israel's miseries during the winter. Seven-eighths of rural Russia is now infinitly worse than that of rustic France on the eve of the Revolution. Men look to see a Muscovite reign of terror begun this winter which will well-nigh efface from human memory the excesses and horrors begun by the fall of the Bastile. The czar himself sees only too vividly the handwriting on the wall. It would seem as if he dreaded to go back to Russia at all. He is staying much longer in his carefully-guarded Danish retreat than he originally intended, and it is said that the preparations which hav been making at the palace in Livadia for the celebration of his silver wedding on November 9th hav been suddenly suspended.

The Gospel According to John.

IV.

37. Matthew and Mark say that when Jesus was accused before the high priest he was silent until urged the second time by that dignitary to answer whether he was the Meshiha. According to John there was no hesitation on the part of Jesus to respond to the questions of the high priest, and his only offense was in not answering more explicitly as to what he had taught, saying: "Ask them which heard me what I hav said to them. Behold they know what I said." For this evasion one of the officers struck Jesus with the palm of his hand, saying: "Answerest thou the high priest so?" John says nothing about Jesus being charged with blasphemy for saying he was the Meshiha, and causing the high priest to rend his clothes. And John ignores the spitting in Jesus's face.

38. From the palace of Caiaphas Jesus was led to the judgment hall of Pilate, and John is particular to say that the Jewish officers "themselvs went not into the judgment hall lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the passover." Is it not clear enough from this that the paschal meal was yet to be eaten? The supper which Jesus and his disciples had eaten was not that paschal feast. And now how the translator of the "Emphatic Polyglott" tries to reconcile this contradiction of the synoptics. He says:

> It was probably then thought lawful for the Jews to eat the paschal lamb at any hour between the two evenings, though Exod. xii, 6, 8, seems to require it to be eaten at the time Jesus ate it.

How blind not to see that according to John the supper which Jesus ate was not the paschal feast! It was twenty-four hours too soon.

39. Some of the omissions of John in narrating the trial before Pilate and the crucifixion are as follows: The repentance of Judas; the dream of Pilate's wife; the washing of Pilate's hands; the spitting upon Jesus; the bearing of the cross by Simon of Cyrene; the tasting of vinegar and gall; the reviling and wagging of heads by the people; the mocking by the chief priests and scribes; the reviling by the two thieves; the darkness from the sixth to the ninth hour; the dying words of Jesus, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" the earthquake and resurrection of many saints; the many women from Galilee who beheld the crucifixion afar off; the presence of Herod tetrarch of Galilee and his participation in the trial; the pathetic address of Jesus to the daughters of Jerusalem as they followed him to the place of execution weeping; the words of Jesus on the cross as recorded by Luke "Father, forgiv them, for they know not what they do;" the promis to the thief that rebuked his companion for reviling Jesus, "To day shalt thou be with me in paradise;" the final words of Jesus as recorded by Luke, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

40. The inscription put upon the cross John says was written by Pilate in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, thus: "This is Jesus the Nazarean, king of the Jews" (Syriac version). The other evangelists hav it differently, as follows: "This is Jesus the king of the Jews" (Matt.); "The king of the Jews" (Mark); "This is the king of the Jews" (Luke).

41. John says that "there stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene." Matthew and Mark say that there were women looking on afar off, among whom were Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James and Joses, and Salome. They do not name or mention the mother of Jesus. Luke says that certain women followed Jesus as he went to the place of execution, but stood afar off beholding the crucifixion. And John adds that when Jesus "saw his mother and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith unto his mother: Woman, behold thy son, and to the disciple: Behold thy mother. And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home."

42. The presence of John himself at the cross is incompatible with the accounts given by the other evangelists, especially Luke, who says: "And all his acquaintance, and the women that followed him from Galilee, stood afar off beholding these things."

43. The last words of Jesus according to John, as given in the Greek version, were: "It is finished;" in the ancient Syriac, as translated by Dr. Murdock, the last words were, "Lo! done."

44. All four gospels say that the soldiers parted the garments of Jesus by casting lots. John says they "made four parts, to every soldier a part," but as the coat was without seam they said: "Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it whose it shall be, that the scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted my garments among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots." And that same coat, miraculously preserved from decay, has lately been exhibited to two millions of pilgrims in an ancient cathedral at Treves. And what is perhaps more miraculous, it is lined with costly silk and is no longer seamless. And more miraculous still, some twenty other European churches hav the same holy coat that was won at a raffle by a Roman soldier.

45. The breaking of the legs of the two thieves is mentioned by John only, who adds:

> But when they came to Jesus and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs; but one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side and forthwith came thereout blood and water. . . . For these things were done that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken, and again another scripture saith, They shall look on him whom they pierced.

46. John says "It was the preparation of the passover" (xix, 14), and again:

> The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath day (for that Sabbath day was a high day) besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away.

Is it not clear enough that according to John the trial and crucifixion took place on the day before the passover and the Sabbath, which coming together made that Sabbath "a high day?"

47. Joseph of Arimathea, a secret disciple of Jesus, besought Pilate that he might take away the body of Jesus. Arimathaia is the blundering Greek name for Ramath, in the Syriac version; and it is supposed to be the same as Ramah, the birthplace of Samuel, which it is impossible to locate. Joseph, according to John, was assisted by Nicodemus in taking away the corpse and preparing it for burial. "Nicodemus brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds weight." None of the other evangelists mentions Nicodemus here or elsewhere. And they say that Mary Magdalen and Mary the mother of Joses beheld where the body was laid. Nor do the synoptics say that any spices or ointments were brought until the body had lain in the tomb two nights. It was the preparation day. Preparation for what? For the Sabbath, say the synoptics; for the passover and Sabbath, says John. The paschal meal was yet to be eaten on that Friday evening, the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath and passover-day. Furthermore, the death of Jesus answered symbolically for the killing of the paschal lamb, as appears from 1 Cor. v, 7: "For our passover is the Meshiha, who was slain for us" (Syriac version).

48. At daylight on Sunday morning the body of Jesus was not in the sepulcher. "Very early in the morning," says Luke—"as it began to dawn," says Matthew—"when it was yet dark," says John, "cometh Mary Magdalene, and seeth the stone taken away from the sepulcher." She did not come with spices to anoint the body; that had already been done by Nicodemus. She came alone, according to John, not with "the other Mary," as Matthew says, much less with a third woman, Salome, as Mark has it, or "other women that were with them," as Luke tells us.

49. Mary saw no angel sitting on the stone, no young man sitting inside, no two men in shining garments, at this first visit to the tomb. Seeing the stone removed she ran away, and meeting Simon Kepha and the disciple whom Jesus loved, she said: "They hav taken away the Lord out of the sepulcher and I know not where they hav laid him." (The Greek version has "we," but in the ancient Syriac it is "I.") Simon and John then ran a race to the sepulcher. John got there first and "stooping down, saw the linen clothes lying; yet went he not in." Then came Simon, and he went in, followed by John. There they saw the linen clothes, and the napkin "wrapped in a place by itself."

So far there was no ghost or angel seen at the sepulcher by Mary Magdalene, or anybody else, according to John, who tells us he was the second person who reached the place in the darkness of the early morning.

50. But after Simon and John had gone away Mary, who lingered there weeping, "stooped down and looked into the sepulcher, and seeth two angels in white, the one at the head and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain." "Woman, why weepest thou?" said the angels. "Because they hav taken away my Lord and I know not where they hav laid him." (The Greek version has "I" this time.) Then turning around Mary saw a man standing there, and the man repeated the same question: "Woman, why weepest thou?" Mary, strange to say, did not recognize the man, who was Jesus; and she said: "Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away." Jesus then, to reveal himself, said: "Mary," and she answered: "Rabboni." "Touch me not," said Jesus, "for I am not yet ascended to my Father; but go to my brethren and say to them, I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God."

51. Mary went and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord and that he had spoken these things unto her. And this is all the evidence, according to John, of the resurrection of Jesus until the evening of that day. And does not the writer of the fourth gospel say, that Simon and himself "as yet knew not the scripture that Jesus must rise from the dead?" And do not the other gospels say as much in regard to all the rest of the disciples? They did not yet believe the story told by the women.

52. In the evening of the same day, the disciples being assembled with closed doors for fear of the Jews, says John, Jesus appeared in the midst and said: "Peace be unto you." Then he showed them his hands and his side, which convinced them that he was their risen Lord.

Matthew knows nothing of any appearance of Jesus to his disciples, except in a far-off mountain in Galilee.

Luke describes a meeting of the eleven apostles and others in the evening of the resurrection-day, convened apparently to consider a report that the Lord had risen and appeared to Simon. Whether Simon, who was there, confirmed that rumor we are not told. But presently came two disciples, one of whom was Cleophas and the other not named, who said that they had traveled that day to Emmaus (a place designated as seven and a half miles from Jerusalem, but which has never yet been located) and that a stranger joined them, who did not seem to know anything about the death and reported resurrection of Jesus. And yet, when told about these things, the stranger expounded the scriptures to prove that the Meshiha ought to hav undergone that kind of a death and resurrection, followed by an ascension into glory. This stranger, they said, on arriving at Emmaus would hav gone further, but they constrained him to stop and take supper with them, the day being far spent. And as they sat at meat he took bread and brake and gave it to them. Then they recognized their crucified Lord, and he vanished out of their sight. While the two disciples were telling this story to the eleven and others there assembled, lo! Jesus himself stood in the midst of them and said: "Peace be unto you." But they were terrified and supposed they saw a spirit. To convince them that he was not a spirit he said: "Handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me hav." Then he showed them his hands and feet, and proceeded to eat a piece of broiled fish and honeycomb, after which he expounded the scriptures, showing that it was written that the Meshiha was to suffer and to rise from the dead the third day.

Mark also briefly adverts to the appearance of the risen Jesus to two disciples as they walked into the country, and adds that when this was told to the residue they did not believe it. And afterward, says Mark, Jesus appeared to the eleven as they sat at meat and upbraided them for their disbelief of those who said they had seen him.

Mark, Luke, and John describe the same meeting, but differ widely. John says nothing about any prior appearance of the risen Jesus except to Mary Magdalen, and does not intimate that the assembled disciples were at all terrified at his miraculous appearance among them, though the doors were shut. And in conclusion John says that Jesus breathed on them saying:

> Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whosesoever sins ye remit they are remitted unto them, and whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained.

This is a substantial repetition of Matt. xviii, 18, spoken to the disciples in Galilee.

53. The absence of Thomas at the first meeting of the disciples after the resurrection is noted only by John. When Thomas was told what had occurred he said: "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side I will not believe."

The other evangelists say nothing about the skepticism of Thomas, and do not even imply his absence from that first meeting.

Nowhere else in the New Testament except in the above passage from John's gospel does the word "nail" or "nails" or "nailing" occur. It is true that King James's translation of Col. ii, 14, reads, "nailing it to his cross;" but that is a mistake of the Greek scribe. The ancient Syriac version has "affixed to his cross;" and the Latin Vulgate has "affigens illud cruci." Nowhere else in Paul's epistles is there a word which even in the Greek version implies nailing. And there is nothing in the description of the crucifixion given by the four evangelists which implies the use of nails. "Neither the Jews nor any other people," says Voltaire, "ever thought of fixing persons to the cross by nails; there is not a single instance of it; it is a fiction of some painter, built upon a notion completely erroneous" (Phil. Dic., Art. Executioner).

Does it not look as if the passage in John's gospel about the print of the nails is a modern interpolation? But more of this anon. ANTICHRIST.

We must reluctantly make the admission that Christian medical science was in advance of that of the Greeks, Jews, and Saracens in at least one particular, the nature and use of poisons. Practical toxicology was the highest feather in the plume of Christian medicin, and assassin stabs with the dagger the normal exercise of Christian surgery.—Saladin.

Oregon State Secular Union—Treasurer's Report

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker: Through the columns of your paper I want to reach all the members of the Oregon State Secular Union and herewith, as treasurer of the same, submit my annual report of all moneys received and paid out, and thus all can know something of what it costs to carry on the organization. The current expenses for the year, outside of field secretary's salary, were $89 50. Congress expenses were $175.40. The field secretary was allowed $250, which makes the expenses for year $514 90, with receipts $492 90; leaving a debt of $22. I also append the names of those who generously "lent a hand" at the congress with the sinews of war.

A Spiritualist to the Oregon Freethinkers.

To the Oregon Secular Union: I am sorely disappointed in not being able to be present at your annual convention. Circumstances over which I hav no control render it impossible, and I must submit. But I am with you in spirit, and am in hearty sympathy with your work. It is vastly more important than the average Freethinker now imagins. Herculean efforts are being put forth by the bigoted minions of the church, on the one hand, to make of this nation a theocracy, with the church and state united; while upon the other, the cohorts of mammon are seeking to found a gilded, soulless aristocracy upon the ruins of the people's government.

What the union of church and state implies, let the most bloody epoch in the world's annals, the twelve hundred and sixty years of the so-called Christian era, when Rome held universal sway and her power in civil and ecclesiastical affairs was supreme, giv answer. Is the history of the Dark Ages to be repeated? Shall the throne of ecclesiastical tyranny, built by bigotry and founded in ignorance and superstition, again dominate the destinies of the world? Between the two thieves of church and state shall the Christ of human freedom be again crucified, and liberty flee from the hearts of men? Shall the hand on the great dial of progress be turned backward? Shall our hopes be blasted, and our cherished institutions be overthrown? Shall our daughters be sold to the highest bidder in the shambles of lust, and shall our sons come up as a generation of slaves?

Shall ignorance triumph over knowledge, and superstition eclipse enlightenment? Shall gold take precedence of brains, and a senseless ecclesiasticism usurp the prerogativs of manhood and womanhood? Are we willing to liv slaves? Are we poltroons and fawning sycophants, cringing in ignoble obedience to the most unscrupulous powers that ever drenched the earth in blood? If not, then why do we slumber on the very brink of fate?

Our greatest danger is our apathy and apparent blindness to the perils that environ us. All Liberals, Freethinkers, and Spiritualists should awake, and stand shoulder to shoulder, ready to meet the issues of the impending conflict.

We are nearing a tremendous culmination. The gathering storm will soon burst upon us. Of what value your homes or your financial treasures, if our enemies triumph? Count no sacrifice too great that may be needed to further the cause of Freethought and secure for all time to come both to ourselvs and to our children the Nine Demands of Liberalism as our birthright and inalienable heritage for ever. With universal mental liberty, equal rights, and exact and impartial justice inscribed upon our banners, let us go forth ready to die, if need be, in the defense of those vital principles that so intimately concern our temporal salvation. As for myself, life has no charms, and death no terrors, when my personal liberty is taken from me.

I will not liv except as a free man, and I am ready to die to bequeath that priceless boon to those that shall come after me. I trust the utmost harmony may pervade your gatherings, and wisdom and knowledge characterize your deliberations.

San Jose, Cal., Sept. 30, 1891. N. F. Rawlin.

The Cause in Washington.

At Plumb Station, Thurston county, the Liberals—ever the steadfast and self-sacrificing friends of education and our public schools—by their indomitable perseverance and energetic push, succeeded in having erected a very handsome and commodious school-house, enabling them to dispense with the old shack that years ago had become alike unsightly and unsuitable.

They hav such stanch and true Liberals as Miss Lou Hartgrave, the talented young artist of Olympia, who, forsaking alike easel and ease of city life for the sombrous solitudes of the dense forest, staked out a claim, had a little house erected and lived there alone, labored at cutting a trail to the river, building fence, slashing, clearing, planting, and, despite all disadvantages, held down her claim and complied with all the requirements of the law; A. E. Sheldon, of Tumwater, who has purchased the Plumb ranch, one of the most intelligent and highly respected citizens of that township; the radical devotee of liberty and fearless exponent of the rights of the people, C. H. Reichel, and his good wife, a right royal helpmate; the genial old veteran in the ranks of Infidelity, C. F. Woolford, and the fair and fascinating young champions of Liberalism, the Misses Lillie and Ophelia Suerlock. Of course they insisted on having the flag of our nation floating from the cupola to inspire love of liberty in the children.

The above-named had done the work of securing the erection of the school-house, and decided it should be appropriately dedicated to secular education and Freethought by a brief course of Liberal lectures, a grand ball and supper, and most admirably was that program carried out.

There was some misunderstanding about the time of delivering the lectures on Sunday, some supposing it was to be morning and evening, and others that it was to be afternoon and evening. To avoid possibility of any disappointment I delivered lectures morning, afternoon, and evening. All three were well attended and listened to with increasing interest. On Monday evening a special train from Olympia and Tumwater brought three coaches of merry visitors.

Some had growled that the school-house was larger than the necessities of the district at this time required, but all had to admit it was not half large enough to accommodate those who desired to participate in its dedication. After the lecture eight names were added to the membership of the Washington Secular Union, and they elected Miss Hartgreaves as vice-president for that district.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE.

The Sunday fanatics are quite demoralized. Here in Seattle, the Opera House, Courdray's Theater, and other places of amusement, giv performances every Sunday night. Stores open or close as the proprietors elect, and none to make them afraid. Yet one chief of police declares Sunday is an off-day with the force, and he can giv his men half holiday now on Sundays.

The friends at Chattanooga, Tenn., hav got out a very neat edition of my pamphlet on Sunday Laws. We hav found it a most mighty power for good in our state and sincerely hope it may prove even more effectiv in Tennessee.

LETTERS TO THE GOVERNOR.

The Washington Secular Union had one thousand copies of the short letter to the governor protesting against his Thanksgiving proclamation printed and they hav been distributed among the vice-presidents to secure signers and hav them mailed to the governor. Let no Liberal in Washington fail to so write.

C. B. Reynolds,
Secretary Washington Secular Union.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

It is said now that the French pilgrims did not insult the tomb of Victor Emanuel, but that one of them wrote in the register that the pope alone is king. But he was arrested and the pilgrims mobbed, and Rome for a while was greatly excited, and the cries of the mob found an echo in the newspapers. Literary fire was opened upon all France for the act of the over zealous M. Dreux. The Figaro says the incident enlightens Frenchmen in regard to the true sentiment of the friends of Magenta and Solferino. The Observateur says that it is impossible to describe the hatred of France that is nourished by the Italian Liberals so called. "The thing amounts to hysteria. It is an unnatural hatred born of vanity, jealousy, and stupid fear." Young M. Dreux can flatter himself on the size of the fire he lighted. According to several Catholic papers the incident brings up once more the question, must the pope leave Rome? Catholic Austria and a considerable portion of Catholic Germany might hav something to say upon the subject, and the little affair might become a serious international question. In substance the Italian papers say, "Let the pope go, the sooner the better. There is no room in Rome for him and the king."

"Corea will, no doubt," says the Bombay Modern Thought, "be complaining before long, as it has been compelled to agree to a clause in the recent treaty by which the Bible is to be received in that country, although Coreans prohibit its landing as an immoral book."

Mr. Watts having become proprietor of Baskervile Hall, Birmingham, he proposes in connection therewith—1. To establish an institute based upon Rationalistic principles. 2. To hav regular Sunday lectures upon Secular and Freethought subjects. 3. To form week-night classes for singing, music, dramatic recitals, and general social recreation. 4. To circulate Agnostic and other Freethought literature. 5. To make Birmingham the center of a Secular Federation for the Midland counties. 6. To provide a reading and consulting room for the use of members of the institute and their friends. Mr. Watts is cutting quite a swath since he returned to England, and several fatted calves hav been killed for him.

The London Freethinker regrets to learn, as will Freethinkers everywhere, that Captain Otto Thomson is reduced in circumstances through his constant efforts to propagate Freethought in Sweden. Circumstances compel him to cease his connection as business manager to Fritänkaren, but he loses none of his interest in the cause, and hopes his foreign friends will continue to send him their papers. Captain Otto Thomson, Stockholm, Sweden, will be sufficient address.

A bookseller in the Friesland town of Sneek translated "Robert Elsmere" into his nativ tongue, and was rewarded for his pains by gaining a ready sale for the volume. The translator, however, has imparted to a British traveler the information that though Mrs. Humphrey Ward's opinions about society and human relationships were new and acceptable to Sneek on the ground of their novelty, Sneek was by no means struck with the religious element in her story. This last element seemed to it insipid, obsolete, and quite behind the times.

M. Araujo, in the Nouvelle Revue, gives an interesting sketch of Benjamin Constant Botelho de Magalhães, the founder of the Brazilian republic. He was a Positivist, and as professor at the Military College he imbued the officers of the army with his advanced principles. He took a leading part in the revolution, but when it was successful he stepped aside and declined all honors. But he was forced to take the post of minister of war, and in that position taught the citizen-soldier to regard himself as the guardian of "peace, progress, and reform." He died of heart disease in January, and his name is inscribed upon the records of Congress as the founder of the Brazilian republic.

News and Notes.

The Liberals of San Francisco gathered in Union Square Hall Monday evening, October 12th, under auspices of the Freethought Society, Charles F. Bergman, president. I gave a lecture on "The American Government," outlining the principles of the Universal Republic according to the philosophy of Thomas Paine and Herbert Spencer. The state is simply a function of society, made by society for a definit purpose, and cannot in its very nature represent all the activities of man's social existence. It is organized force—a police force for the prevention of crime. It is the existence of crime—that is, the forcible invasion of individual rights—which justifies the existence of the state. The state must be limited in its operation, or it becomes, especially in a democracy, the greatest of tyrannies. The power of the "majority vote" must be contracted. In no single instance should it be allowed to invade the rights of an individual. The state is for the individual, not the individual for the state. The state is not a divinity—only a piece of machinery in the hands of the people to do certain things and no more. The greatest danger in the American republic is the centralization of power. The power of the state should be distributed, should be as near the people as possible. The town meeting is the fundamental form of political power. The town, the county, the state, the nation, are different forms of power, not derived from each other, but directly from the people. The power constantly abides in the people, and the state has no authority except what is expressly granted by the people. The usurpations of the state, however, even in the American republic, are innumerable. There is in the administration of affairs a constant violation of rights. In the best government in the world, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." The state, as Paine says, is a "necessary evil," in its very nature a dangerous exercise of power; and the less its function, the better for society.

The union of church and state is only one form of the usurpation of the majority. There are other forms to be equally guarded against. The politician and the priest are about the same, and generally unite to tyrannize over the people. They both spring from the evils of human nature and not from its virtues.

Liberalism in San Francisco at present is somewhat dormant. I look forward, however, to good work between now and the state convention. A few are ready to coöperate, and upon these few depends the success of the future.

On Thursday, October 15th, I leave San Francisco for Sacramento via Stockton. At Stockton I meet W. F. Freeman and other friends, and arrange for lectures October 22d and 23d. Stockton has an air of prosperity. Its elegant courthouse is now completed, and it presents a magnificent appearance. It was somewhat of a climb to its stately cupola, but the wide prospect over the plains, covered with orchards and vineyards, the city embowered in trees, with many beautiful dwellings and busy thoroughfares, rewards one for the labor. It was a splendid day, and the spectator could look for miles over the luminous country. Now is the royal time for California in this "gorgeous and jeweled October."

I arrived at Sacramento on Friday evening, and the welcome lights in the home of N. D. Goodell greet the splendor of moonlight that makes the whole city seem like an enchanted garden, in the midst of which, in white radiance, in the noble simplicity of Greek architecture, towers the vast capitol. Saturday morning, over the shining plains—not a cloud in the sky, and soft summer in the air—Mr. Goodell drives me to the residence of O. T. Davies, Brighton, where the tall trees make a sylvan shade and the flowers bloom. Our friend is not at home, and we return to find him in the city. The drive is a delightful one, the glittering atmosphere making the fields and woods and streams like a picture of romance.

Saturday afternoon I call upon our radiant friend, Dr. Light, who has all sorts of curiosities in his sanctum sanctorum. The doctor studies the Bible and nature with intense enthusiasm. He has innumerable texts at command, and puzzles the profoundest theologian. He has a wonderful display of butterflies, a thousand of them, I should think, with many forms and wings of marvelous color. Butterfly existence, even if it is short, must be a happy one, coming and going with a mass of splendor which the most cunning human art cannot equal. Dr. Light believes in self reliance, and the following maxim upon his walls explains his philosophy, Godward and manward: "The Lord helps those who help themselves; but the Lord help the man caught helping himself here."

Saturday evening I attend the session of the state convention of the Young Men's Christian Association of California. The attendance is not very large, not more than three hundred being present in the assembly chamber of the capitol, where the convention is held. I am surprised at the smallness of the number. We hav twice as many at our convention, and so we can hope that after all some day we will be "in the swim." Evidently the Young Men's Christian Association is not "in the swim." There didn't seem to be much enthusiasm. The resolution in favor of closing the World's Fair on Sunday was accepted with ominous silence. Not a single cheer greeted its announcement. It stated: "We view with alarm the proposed opening of the World's Fair on Sunday." I am glad the Christians are getting scared. They will be worse scared than ever when they see a hundred thousand people thronging the Fair on Sunday. Let them prepare for a terrific fright. It will come, Lord's day or no Lord's day. It is time for the people to rule.

As an offset to the dull and colorless meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association I went afterward to the Chinese "Josh." This was fine indeed, a great improvement on the Young Men's Christian Association. The jingle was lively; the idols were resplendent; they shone with gay attire. The worshipers looked happy, even hilarious. The little boys were gorgeous, the priests were magnificent. Such elegant dresses; and the music—it was expressiv. The drums were so jolly, and cymbals and pipes so energetic. I think the Chinese enjoy their religion. It does not seem to make them miserable. It is pervaded by a festiv spirit. The Chinese are ahead of the Christians in this respect—when their gods do not behave they whip them. The Chinese opinion is that the gods are made for human use, and if they will not make the world happy freely, then they must be made to do it by a sound thrashing. How much wiser is the superstition of the Chinese than the superstition of the Young Men's Christian Association.

After the "Josh" I rode upon the electric car and thus enjoyed the luxury and hight of civilization upon what Oliver Wendell Holmes calls the "broomstick train." The witches are now harnessed to work. We see the glitter of their feet along the wire, the flash of their eyes, and hear the soft purr of the historic cat wherein the devil is supposed to locate. I had a triangular experience on this Saturday night. I touched the two poles of barbarism—the Chinese Josh and the Young Men's Christian Association—and the pole of civilization, with its swift and luminous vibrations—the electric car.

On Sunday evening I lecture in Pioneer Hall. The audiences are increasing. I had more present than at any of my previous lectures. I was pleased to meet with Mr. and Mrs. Burns. Mr. Burns is now lecturer for the Farmers' Alliance and is infusing the spirit of Liberalism into that somewhat religious body. Of course labor reform goes hand in hand with the progress of Freethought. The church and the money power hav always been allied.

I was glad to meet with other friends. I received several additions to THE TRUTH SEEKER list. Mr. and Mrs. Davies are always with us and never fail to lend a hand. As Mr. Goodell says, "If we had a hundred like Davies we'd make a revolution in short time." Mr. Davies is not only a most generous contributor but he knows the Bible by heart and can "kill" the Christian theologian with his own book. His elucidation of the ancestry of Jesus would make his disciples wish that some of the Bible records were lost.

The home of my friend Mr. Goodell has been darkened since I was here last spring. His daughter Julia has died—a lady whom I was always glad to meet, gentle and pleasant in her manners, a member of the church and sincere in the faith, but with a genuin humanitarian spirit, desirous to make this world by her own efforts a better world. Her belief was Christian, but her virtues are natural and beautiful, and her loss is deeply felt. Whatever there may be of hope, faint or bright, in the unknown hereafter, in the halls of memory with sweeter luster shine the deeds of nobleness, the character of truthfulness, the kind, loving, tender, affectionate qualities of daughter, sister, friend, and companion.

I expect to be at Stockton, Oakdale, and Angel's Camp during this month, at Boulder Creek November 1st, and during November I shall lecture at San Diego and through Southern California. My permanent address at San Francisco is 101 Fifth street, care of Charles F. Burgman. Mr. Burgman is president of San Francisco Freethought Society. Will friends please take notice, and direct letters to his care?

I am sorry not to meet R. Butterfield. He is away looking after the mines. I hope the gold will flow forth. One thing is sure: if Butterfield ever gets rich he will build a Freethought hall in Sacramento, and then our colors will fly.

Sacramento, Oct. 19, 1891. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

On Corporate Law, with Irrigation as a Text.

To Hon. T. C. Jourdan, Member of Constitutional Convention, Phœnix, A. T.:

DEAR SIR: I appreciate the intense interest you show in regard to the irrigation question and corporate power that will occupy the attention of your convention.

Man was made to protect and improve himself. Supreme wisdom and beneficence could make him no other way. His physical and mental nature can only be developed and sustained by continued exercise, producing a good citizen, the object of all law.

Recognizing these principles simplifies the field and magnifies the importance of constitution and law-makers by confining their labors to the production of formulas or laws that man may protect himself and develop his physical and mental powers.

Our irrigation law, under which all our titles of priority of appropriation of water hav been vested, entitled in the original code "of acequias or irrigating canals," prostituted by our late code commissioners to read, "of acequias and irrigating canals," was formulated in 1864 by Judge Wm. T. Howell from the experience of the irrigating world, giving to irrigators the power to protect and improve themselvs; it would adorn any state constitution in the arid regions.

The act of Congress of 1866 confirming said irrigation law breathes the same spirit, lately reiterated by our own government, in asserting that the people of New Orleans had acted and the only business of the central government was to ascertain if they had made a mistake.

Said Territorial Irrigation Law requires amplification empowering the irrigators of natural districts to elect an overseer to distribute the water of the streams to the various irrigating canals in each district with like restraints and power accorded to the canal-owners to perfect the execution of said laws.

In a late lecture of one of our learned supreme judges of the United States court to the law students of Yale College, Conn., he asserted with truth that Rev. Cotton Mather and his associates in the prosecution of witches to their hanging were murderers, and in his justifiable attack upon the condition of our jury system intimated that judges might supply their place. In this connection I would say "that legal training only makes a man more incompetent in questions that require a knowledge of another kind."

Does anyone doubt that had the court in California been enabled to select four masters of the subject of irrigation for sole jurymen to consult with the court, said court would not hav disgraced itself by extending the common law of England over California in the matter of irrigation, a subject that never existed in England?

In this age of mechanical skill and scientific training necessary in our economic development educating the individual in his specialty for the companionship of the courts, a formula is necessary for the selection of jurymen, because of their special knowledge of the subject under adjudication or of individuals and their surroundings that may affect the nature of the crime with which they are charged.

Said learned supreme judge, in his lecture, neglected to state that the Rev. Cotton Mather and the ministers and churches all along the Atlantic frontier, who murdered or committed other fearful crimes of persecution, had been as badly persecuted under the highest civilization of the Old World, proving that action and reaction are everywhere equal, and that the death penalty and the penitentiary of our courts are an attempt of ignorance to destroy a natural law, that only needs proper direction under a higher civilization in reformatory schools to produce the illumination of the world in the same manner as these learned priestly criminals by their development in rubbing with such intensity against the rough corners of humanity in planting our civilization, became the ardent supporters of our Constitution that separated the churches and religions from any special privileges or powers in our secular government that could not hav been adopted without their earnest support, while they devoted themselvs to uproot superstition by their ardent support of all secular educational institutions obscuring in the memory of their surroundings the history of their crimes by the illumination of the civilized world in their overwhelming the power of precedent by said acts which had led them to their crimes and still linger in our courts, as the only means of protecting the follies and crimes of the most useless of mankind.

Grander intellects produced by still rougher scouring against the rough edge of humanity that the inherited experience of our forefathers and the developments of science hav produced are to-day fortified with their overwhelming crimes behind the generous gift of the people, coöperate power.

To this enormity of their own creation the people hav poured forth their generous gifts, spurring it to action, until to-day the whole intelligence of the country stands appalled at the concentration of the wealth it has produced in the hands of the few and has decided that the power to produce such a monopoly and the crimes that attend it shall cease. The united intelligent will of a free people is law and they only wait for a formula for its execution so wisely constructed that these grander intellects with all their crimes may take the place of the criminal ministers of the Atlantic coast as wheel-horses in the chariot of human development reilluminating mankind.

Corporate power has killed thousands of its most valuable employees by overwork, endangering millions of lives from their physical inability for so many hours to attend to the responsible duties which they demanded. The corporate power of the railroads has enabled them to sell their stocks for nearly five times the cost of building the roads after they had pocketed the generous subsidies of the people requiring them to pay the interest in freights and fares upon this fictitious value together with the enormous fees they pay attorneys to deceive the people.

Corporate churches in New York alone receive the special privilege of freedom from taxation that would yield a yearly tax to the city of $2,000,000, and with fellow-feeling men join their ministrations whose untaxed property should add many millions more to the yearly tax receipts of that city.

The special privilege granted corporate power by natural law rivets and sustains its power by yielding to the demands for special privileges in accordance to the pertinacity or influence of the individual, company, or trust, until the solitary traveler becomes lonely in his isolation that simply demands of a corporation his rights.

May the members of your convention close their labors feeling as did our late esteemed Judge Titus after his delivering of his instruction to the jury in the Camp Grant massacre: "I know not what Eastern sentiment may think, but I know I hav done my duty." CHAS. TRUMBULL HAYDEN.

Tempe, Sept. 18, 1891.

Sunday and the World's Fair.

From the St. Joseph Herald.

That fanatical spirit which would enforce such a strict observance of Sunday by closing the World's Fair on that day will make us ridiculous before all the world and finally result in a general opposition to any observance of the day at all. The great mass of our people are prone to keep that one day as a day of rest. Universal custom is stronger than all the laws ever made. Sunday as a day of rest is popular. There is no need of any law or any penalty to enforce the law. Never move quiet things, is a maxim of good government. It were best never to enforce a custom so generally observed as this of Sunday-keeping by punishing occasional infractions. Public opinion, all-powerful, will do everything that is needed. While the day is solemnly kept by the religious and customarily by all as a rest throughout the rural districts and in all towns and villages, in the larger cities and manufacturing centers the people relieved from indoor or sedentary employment rejoice in Sunday for its out-of-door sights. Thus the very reverse of what takes place in the country occurs in the towns. The country folk are afield all the week, the townspeople are housed. And yet these deluded fanatics of Sabbath observers make no discrimination and would force all of us into houses on that day to hear long prayers and sermons. Instead of the free observance of that day for rest and recreation they would make it one of painful ceremony and odious quiet to toiling millions. And on what ground? On the assumed authority of a text of scripture applied to Saturday ages ago by a command addressed to an isolated tribe of people whom to-day these very fanatics would punish for their literal obedience to that very command. Now this order to close the World's Fair is going to raise a world-wide strife and discussion, and as two-thirds of Christians observe the day out of custom, thinking it has some peculiar sacredness, their eyes must become opened to the facts as stated by Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, and all the great reformers—that "Sunday observance was a restraint of papistry—a mere superstition," and as Luther said, "There is no peculiar sacredness about Sunday more than any other day, and if anyone enjoins on you to hold it as sacred then I order you to sing it out, to play on it, to work on it, and to dance on it, as protesting against such attempts against Christian freedom." To dance on it! And yet these super-sanctimonious Puritans would not allow us to dance even on week-days. We would protest against all such odious restraints by law. We are for the largest liberty of conscience for all men. On that, with the Apostle Paul, we would say, "One man esteemeth one day above another; another man esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be persuaded in his own mind. . . . Why judge thy brother?" Some Christianity is growing in strength every day, the Christianity of Jesus Christ, who said, "Love thy neighbor as thyself; this is all," and of Paul, who said that charity was the virtue above all others and without which all others are as nothing, but not of the Pharisees and hypocrits whom they both denounced—the Christianity which has slowly, but surely, penetrated more and more human hearts, and made us all more kind and gentle. There is neither policy, charity, nor religion in that narrow Phariseeism that would force an Exposition for the whole world into a ceremonious observance of the most insignificant part of a narrow creed. In the world are sects that respectivly observe each a different day until the whole seven are Sabbaths. Even in our own country are Friday, Saturday, and Sunday worshipers, while a very large and most respectable body holds all days alike.

What Did Brown Say?

From the Snohomish Eye.

An Eye reporter was getting a shave last Saturday in the new barber shop next to Cathcart's when Barber Halstead, who had a man in his chair, set out to tell a story. He said:

"I knew a man back in Indiana that got religion. His name was Brown, and he was a blacksmith who couldn't read. He was taken into the Methodist church on probation, and at the end of six weeks the minister came to consult him as to the state of his mind. Brown was blowing his forge. The minister inquired if he was still anxious to unite with the church, and Brown said he was. The dominie began to catechise him a little, inquiring if he believed all there was in the Bible. Brown said he didn't know; never had read the work, not being able to read anything. So the preacher pulled the Bible on him and started to read it. He gave him the story of Joshua stopping the sun and moon, and Brown said it was a tough yarn, but might be true. Then Mr. Preacher sprung Jonah and the whale on him. Brown kept blowing away at his bellows; his fire got hotter all the time, and he sweat big drops. Finally he said he would rather be excused from making up his mind on Jonah until he could hav time to think it over; the parson better read on a little further, and giv him all he had in his locker so he could swallow the whole business at once. Next came the story of the Hebrew children in the fiery furnace. Brown says: 'How hot was that there furnace? Hot as the fire in this forge?' 'Seven times hotter,' says the parson. 'And they never got singed?' Brown asks. 'There wasn't even the smell of fire on their clothes,' the minister tells him. Brown was blowing his bellows all the time, and feeding more coal as fast as it burnt out, and every thing in sight was pretty near red-hot. 'Well,' says Brown, 'if they were chucked into a place seven times hotter than this and never got scorched, all I've got to say is'——"

Just then Siwash came along with a big salmon and asked Halstead if he didn't want it. Halstead shook his head, and went on to say that ever since he had been there people interested in the fish business had called half a dozen times a day. When he had described these parties and told what they said, the customer asked: "But what did Brown say?"

"Oh, yes," said Halstead, "as I was saying, Brown kept pumping away at his bellows, burning out coal, and says he——"

The customer Halstead had been shaving was ready to go, and handed him a coin. The barber couldn't change it and rustled around the neighborhood to get it broken. When he got back he proceeded: "Brown kept blowing his forge until the water in the tub alongside of it began to steam, and he says to the parson: 'If that fire was seven times hotter than this'——"

Here Halstead's laundryman came in after the wash and there was some discussion about the last bill. The narrator had to be again reminded that his story was incomplete, and resumed: "Well, sir, Brown pulled away at the bellows and the blaze got hotter and hotter. All the cobwebs were singed off the beams overhead and the soot in the chimney was catching fire, Brown he wiped the sweat away from his eyes and says he——"

Out on the street at this juncture arose a great outcry. People were running into their doors and others coming out. Along First street came a big pair of black horses hitched to a heavy wagon, that they were yanking over the planks at great speed, with the driver two or three rods behind them. It was a runaway sure enough. The reporter and another man hopped from their chairs, wearing their shrouds out upon the sidewalk. The team disappeared in a cloud of mud, and then everybody came back.

Said Halstead: "Old Brown pumped away at his bellows and says to the minister, says he——" Then the story-teller paused.

"Well, what did he say?" inquired the reporter.

"I'm blanked if I don't forget," Halstead answered shortly. "I never could tell that story very well anyway, and there hav been so many interruptions that I wouldn't finish it now if I could. I want order when I address an audience."

And nobody knows to this day what it was that Brown said.

Women and Fighting Priests and the Fair.

Elder F. W. Evans, head of the Shaker community at Mount Lebanon, N. Y., writes thus to the Sun protesting against closing the World's Fair on Sunday: "As Americans, we protest against all religious legislation. Let sectarians keep the peace, and let each other alone. On Sunday the 'common people,' and the uncommon people, should attend the World's Fair free; for the needy and hungry, provide a free lunch of some hygienic food and drink. It will be an insurance of safety; for hungry people are dangerous people. If all denominations of the clergy who think war a Christian institution are carefully excluded, it will be a wise provision; for war is the basis of all religious legislation and persecution, and war Christians are full of fight. They are Constantinian, church-and-state Christians; like Mormons, they claim to be right, and to hav the right of compelling Quakers, Shakers—peace Christians—and 'all the rest of mankind' to submit to their infernal religious legislation. With God in the American Constitution, we should soon hav the Holy Inquisition in it. Calvin said that 'if Servetus came to Geneva he would take care that he never left it alive;' so he burnt Servetus with a fire of green sticks because he would not admit that Jesus was the son of God 'from all eternity.' Let us prize the liberty of conscience we yet enjoy, not as a toleration of the fighting priesthood, but as one of the 'rights of man' established by fifty Infidels or skeptics who signed the Declaration of Independence. I hope that our next president will be an Infidel, like Abraham Lincoln and Thomas Paine; I am afraid of these war-inquisition Christians. If men like Harrison, or a body of people like Catholics and Protestants, believe in war, will they not fight for their religion and enact religious laws and Sabbaths? All history answers, 'They will.' I am in favor of woman suffrage; yet do I not know that their first use of political power will be to put their war God into the Constitution, and to turn over our secular government into the hands of the priesthood and make it a 'church-and-state Christian government?' It is women and priests that are striving to close the World's Fair on one of the seven Sabbath days (each day being a Sabbath to some of the people who will attend). As taxpayers, we, the Shakers, protest against one dollar of public money being granted to the World's Fair, except upon condition of the Fair being kept open on the seven Sabbath days."

On the Death of Its Former President.

The following resolution on the death of James Parton was adopted at the Manhattan Liberal Club, Friday evening, Oct. 23, 1891:

Resolved, That with grateful recollection of his many sturdy protests against paternalistic encroachments we learn with sincere sorrow of the cessation of the noble labors of James Parton. Unhesitating, uncompromising, and with no politic regard for retrograde conservatism, he was foremost in denouncing the violations of citizen right, which in our time threaten to overthrow the guarantees of liberty established by the founders of the government. Learned, scholarly, thoughtful, considerate, we shall miss his forceful work for freedom, and with deep regret we thus say our adieu.

Lectures and Meetings.

A NEW Freethought lecturer has come to the front. Mr. C. C. Howell, of Grand Rapids, Mich., a retired lawyer, is desirous of doing what he can to free the world from superstition. He has, he says, given the Old Testament a thorough study, as well as ancient history of nations that had gods of their own contemporary with Moses; and he uses the Old Testament as well as much of the New to knock the pins from under the church. He also has several drawings from which he illustrates portions of his lectures. He teaches the brotherhood of man—"that all human beings are brothers and sisters, offspring from the same infinit father and mother, and that all finite entities hav the same final destiny, which is good."

J. G. HERTWIG, P. O. box 413, Washington, D. C., intends to lecture during the forthcoming fall and winter on the following subjects: 1. "National Taxation," opposing the present customs and internal revenue systems of the United States and advocating a not graduated income tax in their stead, for raising the revenue necessary for the support of the government. 2. "Free Coinage," advocating free and unlimited coinage, from American silver, of a temporary silver dollar, correct as to its bullion value, and, as soon as it can be accomplished, an international agreement as to fixed ratio between gold and silver as monetary metals. 3. "Sunday Laws," energetically opposing such laws, as violating the Constitution of the United States, and, in addition, expounding the other demands of Liberalism. He urgently and sincerely solicits engagements for these lectures.

WE will furnish free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. A Freethinker of good address, man or woman, out of work, could make good salary selling this book in any town of fairly Liberal inhabitants.

Communications.

Letter From Mr. Heywood.

In Noyes's "History of American Socialism" it is clearly shown that there can be no real advance toward labor right without serious attention to the property and marriage questions. George Ripley, many years "bound to the flying wings of the daily press" on the New York Tribune, founded Brook Farm in 1841, assisted by Charles A. Dana, Minot Pratt, John Orvis, and others—Hawthorne, Margaret Fuller, Higginson, Curtis, Emerson, the Channings, Larams, Brisbane, Hedge, Bartol—a constellation of gems such as never appeared in our sky before or since. Mr. and Mrs. Ripley, Dana, and Orvis were the quartet of soul-power who set thousands thinking about love, labor, woman, right, duty; yet fifty years later Dana rises in his Sun to croak with Herbert Spencer and Frederic Harrison that it is unsafe to giv woman her rights. "As many slaves so many enemies," said the Latins. In the "Odyssey" (Bryant's version) Homer paints enslaved woman's retributiv power over tyrannizing man:

She led them in and seated them on thrones,
Then, mingling for them Pramnian wine with cheese,
Meal, and fresh honey, and infusing drugs
Into the mixture—drugs which made them lose
The memory of their homes—she h nded them
The beverage and they drank. Then instantly
She touched them with a wand and shut them up
In sties, transformed to swine in head and voice,
Bristles and shape, though still the human mind
Remained to them. Thus sorrowing they were driven
Into their cells, when Circè flung to them
Acorns of oak and ilex, and the fruit
Of carnel, such as nourish wallowing swine.

Later, after these Greek "lords of creation" had "been there" "on a bust" awhile,

Circè took her wand and went
Forth from her halls, and opening the gate
That closed the sty, drove forth what seemed a herd
Of swine in their ninth year. They ranged themselvs
Before her, and she went from each to each
And shed on them another drug. Forthwith
Fell from their limbs the bristles which had grown
All over them, when mighty Circè gave
At first the baleful potion. Now again
My friends were men and younger than before,
And of a nobler mien and statelier growth.

Or as Pope translates the scene:

Soon in the luscious feast themselvs they lost,
And drank oblivion of their nativ coast.
Instant her circling wand the goddess waves,
To hogs transforms them, and the sty receives.
No more was seen the human form divine—
Head, face, and members bristled into swine.

Homer goes on to say that by divine aid Ulysses himself got the better—or worse—of Circè, "enjoyed religion" in the "true inwardness" of it, "knew" her in the Bible way and then went on to another "affinity," Queen Calypso, per Bryant.

Kindly welcomed me,
And cherished me, and would hav made my life
Immortal and beyond the power of age
In all the coming time.

But he tired of her after seven years' "love," cried, sobbed on the sad seashore, and, per Pope,

There sate all desolate and sighed alone,
With echoing sorrows made the mountains groan.

After a twenty years' "bust" away from home on wave and field he reached Ithaca, and his devoted, constant wife, Queen Penelope; but meanly, savagely jealous of her, he raved out, "Who's been here since I'se been gone?" and by fire and sword destroyed most persons and things that had been near and dear to her. It is the old story—"freedom," pleasure for the privileged male few; money, wine, women to the "upper ten;" but slavery and disaster for the under million.

Why should not the women and labor revolt? Mr. Dana knows well enough that what is called "order" is chiefly legalized injustice, and yet he pretends that the freedom impulse is "unsafe." Admission of shes to the he swindle called government, woman suffrage as an end, is of little account, but as a means, a step, the entrance of moral revolt against physical coercion, the woman's rights movement has profound significance and far-reaching destiny. In launching it at Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 1848, Elizabeth Stanton and Lucretia Mott sensed the ultimate. Here in Boston Lucy Stone, Mrs. Livermore, and their bull-pup, H. B. Blackwell (who is a furious Prohibitionist yet imports wine by the cask from Italy and keeps it on tap in his cellar for his own guzzling), represent mere coerciv idiocy. After my release from Dedham jail in 1878 Lucy said, "The more's the pity." Now Blackwell says, "The state's prison is the place for Ezra Heywood." But votes of that sort add to the wrecking force, and the more of them let into the male bear-garden the sooner the whole fraud will tumble. But Mrs. Stanton has a philosophy of morals as well as of politics. When in a New York woman suffrage convention she introduced resolutions for freer divorce, Wendell Phillips, alarmed, said they were revolutionary. Stanton replied, "What are we here for if not for revolution?" Phillips took his hat and left the platform and the hall, but Stanton stood to her guns and Garrison sustained her. Why does not Dana tell Spencer and Harrison the truth, instead of echoing their cowardly, immoral idiocy? In New York and Boston the upper ten oppress, plunder, and debauch the under million; women and children are the chief sufferers. Is it civilization? Mr. Dana's Brook Farm inspirations resent the imputation. Ripley, Congdon, Hildreth, some of the highest Yankee stars, fell, to grub for dollars, drudge for bread, in the columns of the Tribune. Dana has a team of his own, tries to guide the horses of the Sun, but sticks in the slough of Tammany "democracy." Curtis is cupbearer for the Harper plutocrats. But truth livs, and Massachusetts and America will yet be worthy of the air, of all-animating faith and immortal vigor beckoning you and me on.

One of the best illustrations of Karl Heinzen's idea of woman's rights in recent literature can be found in William Morris's "News From Nowhere," a profoundly interesting book. I see Zola's "La Terre" is issued by Laird & Lee, of Chicago. Entire, I hope—that is, without expurgation, as Boston cowardice maltreated his "Money." But to call books of the Laird & Lee tone "realistic" is a libel on human nature. Such girls and women! But Morris's book has healthy, natural, vigorous, attractiv women, that, as men say West, "will do to tie to." Bellamy's lucrativ, clever joke, "Looking Backward," is what we hav here—state's prison "freedom," coerciv bedlam. But Morris's "News From Nowhere" shows that Parliament, Congress, is a dung-house; sloughs off gout, criminal-marriage-property laws; reveals nativ power in us to be well, activ, orderly, ingenious, creativ, social, happy. Warren, Proudhon, Andrews, Greene, Ingalls, Brisbane, Orvis, clearly show that faith delivered to the Ripleys at Brook Farm will liv and rule when Dana's apostasy is forgotten. EZRA H. HEYWOOD

A Looker-On in St. Jo.

Toward the last of August our local grasshoppers, who eat up the people's substance and giv them nothing in return for it but wind, and a very poor article of that, to the number of thirty-five laid their heads together and made arrangements for importing a more noisy one than any of the tribe of St. Jo.

In the hot days of September the Mills came Not like the old style of mills with the burrs, nor the modern mill with its powerful rollers that turns out thousands of barrels of fine flour daily, that sustains the nerves and brains of thousands of toilers, but a little windmill that was turned and kept in operation by thus much money.

Quite a number of the ignorant and timorous, it is reported, were "gathered in" to support the vast number of leeches in St. Jo who pay no licenses for talking for money, nor any taxes on their joss-houses. Did he and his thirty-five aids during the month that they held daily and nightly meetings in the "tent" prevent any railway collisions, crushings and burnings of employees and passengers? Any ships at sea from engulfing men, women, and children in the dark unfathomed caverns of the deep? The crazy husband and father from mangling his wife and innocent children? Did he heal the sick, furnish food and clothing to the starving and naked?

Did he hav the defrauded recompensed and the guilty punished?

Did the forces that produced the hurricane, the cyclone twister, the lightning's flash, or the earthquake's raging become hushed and slumber while he screeched?

Did the Christian Muscovite and Cossack cease to rob and murder the Lord's chosen people in Russia, the most religious and Christian nation on the earth?

No! A thousand noes!

Then what did he do?

Nothing, absolutely nothing. The people who threw away precious time received nothing, but Mr. Mills was paid $1 400 in hard cash. What sober, industrious mechanic or farmer could hav scooped in $1,400 at his trade in one month?

Great is humbug! And the people love to be humbugged by those who can glibly use the words God, Jesus, salvation, heaven and hell, and all of them meaningless.

During the continuance of the tent-meetings conducted by this wind-mill an honest woman and mother actually died from starvation in St. Jo, yet Mills says she should "call on Jesus and he will provide for her." The answer was starvation and death, and a pauper's grave.

Following this fog revival without rain came Mr. T. F. Lyons, an ex-Romanist, advertised to lecture on "The Attitude of Rome Toward Our Public Schools." "Rome in America," "The Abominations of the Romish Confessional." He tried for a week to rent a hall, building, or church, but the power of Rome was too much for him. He could secure none. He finally engaged a dancing hall and advertised by handbills and through the press to lecture there, but Rome forbade it, and the lease was canceled and the doors locked. Mr. Lyons then obtained permission from the mayor to lecture on a vacant lot at the corner of 5th and Edmund streets, near the center of this city. But Rome was too much for him again. A mob of about three hundred, the dupes and slaves of Rome, had possession of the lot before Mr. Lyons arrived and would not permit him to speak one sentence. They chased him from 5th street through Edmund street to the office of the daily Herald, between 9th and 10th streets, where he took refuge.

These "moral devotees of the holy mother church" threw missils during the attack upon this young man, one of which struck him on the back of the neck, and all the distance through three and a half blocks used the vilest language and threatened to "lynch him," "string him up," "hang the damned s—n of a b——," "kill him." This was on Sunday, the "holy Sabbath," Oct. 4, 1891. The police were present but did not in any manner try to disperse the mob nor did they make any arrests. When these pets of Rome found they could not lay their hands upon Mr. Lyons they gradually melted away. Many of our soaring orators talk loudly of this being a free country, the protection of property, liberty, and life, but it is like Mills's revivals—all fog and no rain. Rome to-day controls our politicians, our business men, our legislators, our courts, our police, and even Cleveland and Harrison. Rome rules America to day. No American citizen can freely repeat the record, the history, that Rome has made for herself without danger of being mobbed by the godly devotees of Rome.

Rome delights in anathematizing our public schools as "godless." But the products of our public schools in the ladies and gentlemen of our land are a million times more moral, more virtuous, more honest, more patriotic, more practical, more intelligent, more refined, and better citizens in every respect than the products of the parochial schools—molded abject slaves of the most corrupt of all corrupters, the Roman Catholic church. I heard "Uncle Billy," Gen. W. T. Sherman, in an agony of expression, as though it tore asunder his heart, declare, "The Catholic church has robbed me of my family," and "that the next war we will hav in this country will be with the Roman Catholic church. The late war of the Rebellion will not be a preface to it. It will burst out all over our country, in every state, county, city, town, and village, all over our land at once. Religious wars hav always been the most bloody, cruel, and destructiv of all wars." And at his death Rome tried to steal him. The watchword to all true citizens, of all true patriots, of all true Americans, should be, "America for Americans." Protect the common schools. Protection to each citizen. Complete separation of state and church. No recognition of religion by law. Free soil, free speech and a free press. Then all will be free.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Last week I wrote from Liverpool a brief notice of the splendid meetings held at Manchester in connection with the unveiling of the Bradlaugh memorial portrait, a life-size painting in oils, which was presented to that branch of our National Secular Society by an unnamed friend. Mr. Sickert has done justice to his illustrious subject, and the people of Cottonopolis are justly proud of the gift. Unfortunately for me, the necessities of business detained me in London five minutes too long to allow me to catch the train intended; and although I had been invited with Mrs. Bradlaugh-Bonner, Mr. G. W. Foote, and Mr. J. M. Robertson to say a few words on the occasion, I was only able to witness the departure of a portion of the audience. For all that, it was worth while running down to Manchester, nearly two hundred miles from home; for Manchester is stepping out boldly to the war which Secularists are everywhere prosecuting in these later days.

Perhaps it may be interesting to prospectiv visitors to our shores to know where they can find a hearty welcome from fellow truth seekers. When they land at Liverpool they will not hav far to go. Close to Lime street is Hatton Garden (how fond these provincial towns are of copying the names of London streets), and at the end of Hatton Garden is Vauxhall road, where, at No. 27, may be found a veteran indeed, who can giv the history of Freethought struggles in Liverpool from the memory of a bitter experience. I but seldom go to Liverpool without calling on the aged pilgrim, who is at once a Freethought encyclopædia and a purveyor of American literature. There is a lecture hall in Camden street, close to Lime street station; and I could only wish it were possible to praise the Liverpuddlians for their energy and zeal. Secularists do liv and work there, it is true; but their work is too gravely suggestiv of lassitude to please me.

In striking contrast is the activity of Manchester Freethinkers. Week in, week out, they are always up to something. On Sundays they hav lectures indoor and out. They hav a lovely hall, fresh and fair with paint and pictures. Sundays are busy days therein, for there are usually two or three lectures, often by Londoners. The simplest way to reach Rusholme road is to go to the Infirmary, right in the center of Manchester, take a tram car to "All Saints" for two cents, and Rusholme road is the second turning on the left in Oxford road beyond the point where the cars turn off to the right down Stretford road. Their afternoon out-door station is farther along the Oxford road, opposit the Eye and Ear Infirmary; and here they hold forth on fine Sundays at 3 P.M. Mr. Jones has also extended the out-door work by lecturing himself at a suburb called Gorton; and he apparently means to form a network of open-air stations on the London plan. Wednesdays find them dancing together in their handy hall. The best man for visitors to hunt up is the president, Mr. Hemingway, 25 Higher Chatham street, Stretford road, and he would be but too glad to set folks right.

So much, then, for these two outposts. Visitors to Liverpool should be sure of seeing Manchester, which is but thirty miles away, especially as the wonderful ship canal is sure to attract them a good part of the journey.

Last week I referred to a new and in some respects a remarkable book written in support of undenominational Christianity. The introduction, at all events, will interest American truth seekers; not least so because the writer is so palpably one of your countrymen. Perhaps you will pardon me if I giv a somewhat copious extract to show how seriously our Freethought activity in the old country is influencing Christian thinkers:

Let me introduce this exposition of the creed by the statement of a fact that cannot truthfully be denied, and which, to my mind, is the most startling event of this eventful century.

Seven men, spiritual and mental athletes, good and true, adroit in attack and defense, hav set upon one, and, marvelous to relate, the one has driven the seven in headlong flight from the field. And still—like Goliath's in the valley of Elah—the unanswered challenge daily rings out in unmistakable tones: "Giv me a man, that we may fight together." And again the men of Israel cower in their tents, and the boastful champion has it all his own way.

Yes, seven to one, and the one victorious. In Britain, Mr. Gladstone, Cardinal Manning, and Archdeacon Farrar. In America, Dr. Talmage, Professor Fisher, Judge Black, and Dr. Field. These seven in turn attacked Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, the American Agnostic. And the Agnostic routed them one and all; not by proving the truthfulness of his own position, but by showing in every way the untenableness of theirs. This is a fearful statement and requires irrefutable proof before it can be entertained for a moment. Unhappily the evidence is at hand, known and read of all men. No Christian publishing house—public or private—has ever dared to reproduce the controversy in cold type. What more unanswerable testimony could be adduced than this?

Of course the reverend writer settles the gallant colonel himself, or at all events "Credo and Credulity" is written in order to do so.

Another quaint literary production came to hand to-day. Visitors to Hyde Park may hav seen the many debating and lecturing groups always to be found there on Sundays. Most curious of all the debaters is a little white-haired Communist who has lived his seventy years and more, during sixty of which he has been undoubtedly dying. Old Dan Chatterton, the eloquent, mysterious billposter, has just published his photograph and autobiography, and was good enough to bring me one of each a few hours ago. Occasionally Old Daniel produces his "Scorcher," set up by himself in a most barbaric style of typography, and pressed by his own hands for lack of a printing machine of any kind. In the course of some weeks he thus runs off a hundred copies. The literature equals the typography, and it is needless to say its arrival is always eagerly awaited by the librarian of the British Museum. It is a curiosity, and the next one that comes shall find its way to New York. Your New York Herald (London edition) once printed his portrait, and a London paper gave two fac-simile pages of the "Scorcher." Dan is the recognized Freethought billposter of London, and should he go to glory we hav no one who can adequately take his place.

Yours fraternally, SAM STANDRING.

My Lecture Trip.

Two weeks hav now elapsed since you hav received any report of my labors. I hav no apologies to offer, but an admirable excuse can be found in the fact that I hav done nothing. When I left Ohio for Chicago I had nearly two weeks at my disposal which I preferred to spend in the Windy City. But it was with deep sorrow and mingled regrets that I arrived here to find the kind wife of our late energetic and enthusiastic secretary, E. A. Stevens, very sick; previous to my arrival she had indeed been near to death's door, and it was only by her sheer courage and determination, aided by the constant and devoted attention of those around her, that she has battled successfully through the ordeal and at the time of my departure was rapidly becoming convalescent, and I am pleased to say that later advices say she is now considerably improved. This being my first visit to Chicago, I naturally found many interesting features. I visited the art galleries and museums, and, thanks to the generosity of Mr. George Robertson, I had several drives in his little go-cart with a fast trotting-horse through the handsome parks and beautiful boulevards for which Chicago is noted.

Upon one occasion while partaking of his hospitality I was startled by a cry as of some one in pain. I sprang at once to the window, but I could discern nothing. In a short time the cry was repeated, this time louder and more piteously than before. I scanned each face with an eager questioning look, when methought I perceived a merry, humorous twinkle in the eyes of mine host and hostess. They bade me listen awhile. I listened, and the sound that greeted my ears was like the baying and barking of a multitude of wild animals in a closed cage. For the length of one whole day (Sunday) this concert of unearthly yells continued. There seemed to be no cessation to this Babel of tongues. And imagin my surprise when I learned that all this noise and confusion proceeded from a Methodist church next door, wherein a few of that class of religious devotees known as the Free Methodists or Howlers were conducting their devotional exercises. Never before during the whole of my experience hav I witnessed such a degrading and disgusting scene as presented itself to my view at this time. From the windows of the house we could plainly see into the church. And there I saw a woman (presumably an earnest and pious Christian) kneeling upon the floor swinging her head to and fro, her disheveled hair sweeping the floor at every movement, at the same time crying out in tones of bitter anguish "that she was a miserable sinner." The words of the immortal Burns instantly came to my mind:

Oh wad some power the giftie gie us
To see ourselvs as others see us.

Others were wildly gesticulating, uttering the most horrible cries the while. Some were beating their heads against the walls and benches, and I thought, "How thick" (I mean the heads), when suddenly Sister Saintly yelled out at the top of her voice, way up above the double C (in fact, she must hav got above the range of the gamut), "Glory!" and "Hallelujah!" Then Brother McFuzzle, in a deep basso-profundo, would chime in "amen," with a dim-in-u-en do which made you think it would never end. This seemed to be the signal for another bombardment of the citadels of heaven, which meant an outburst from the assembled crowd in chorus. There are not in the whole range of human vocabulary, ancient, modern, or profane, terms sufficiently expressiv to describe such a scene. Brother Heston, with all the artistic genius he could command, could not faithfully portray such a mad carnival of wild and fanatical ravings. In very truth it beat pandemonium let loose. Dante's "Inferno" sinks almost into nothingness, and Milton's devils are as angels compared with these religious cranks. In fact, Mr. Robertson assured me that if heaven is to be anything like this then he is perfectly satisfied with the earthly sample and would prefer hell for a change. While in Chicago I went in company with friends to see the parade attendant upon the unveiling of the monument erected to General Grant. I gave two lectures here on Sunday, October 4th, before very good audiences. I was pleased indeed to meet with such earnest Liberals as Mr. and Mrs. Robertson, Mr. and Mrs. O'Neil, and above all our old friend E. A. Stevens and family. On the whole my visit to Chicago was spent both pleasantly and profitably. I made many more new friends whom I shall never forget.

Leaving Chicago by the midnight express I arrived in Des Moines, my next place to lecture, Sunday about noon, after a ride of about fourteen hours' duration. Here I met the noted Freethought lecturer, W. S. Bell, who is for the present making this place his headquarters. It was the first time I had had the pleasure of meeting this talented gentleman and the time that I spent in his company was both amusing and instructiv. I gave one lecture here before a large and attentiv audience which welcomed me very cordially indeed. The meeting was in every respect a decided success. Here, as elsewhere, I made more friends whose names I cannot now recall as my stay among them was so short. I regret very much the enforced absence of Franklin Steiner, Mr. Cross, and others whom I had expected to meet; therefore, I can only express a fervent wish that I may meet them upon some future occasion.

Monday morning I left Des Moines on an early train for Iowa City, a distance of one hundred and twenty-one miles, the whole of which was accomplished upon a wretched freight train, with a car attached for the accommodation of passengers. The journey occupied eight hours. There were times during this miserable ride that I even wished I was a Christian for a few minutes, so that I could giv vent to my pent-up feelings and do justice to my surroundings. Tired, and almost out of all patience, I arrived at my destination about 4 P.M. The friends here had almost given me up; they had begun to think that I would disappoint (they did not know me then), but I assured them that, having made an engagement, I was bound to fulfill the same, no matter the inconveniences experienced. I was down here for two lectures, Monday and Tuesday evenings, in the Unitarian church, a handsome brick structure, but I was not destined to lecture on Monday night, for the building had been closed for some time, and owing to the want of use, the gas-pipes were filled with cold air, and we were unable to procure a sufficiency of that for which Freethinkers so ardently strive—light. Therefore the lectures had to be postponed until the following two nights. No doubt the pious element saw in this the intervention of "God." But his victory (if victory it can be called) was only temporary, for next day "science," in the form of a skilled mechanic, cleared the pipes, and the next night we had "light" in abundance.

Iowa City is the site of the State University of Iowa, and the city is full of students, young and old alike. Some of these saw sufficient interest in the lectures to attend them, but my audience was very slim the first night. I gave the students an opportunity to discuss the lecture, which they embraced, and a lively discussion followed lasting till 10 o'clock. The outcome of this was that my audience was nearly doubled the next night, and this time I was favored with the presence of some of the faculty from the University. The lectures were an unbounded success and I was thoroughly pleased with the result. Never before did I realize the absolute necessity of Freethought missionary propaganda than while at this place. There are but few real Liberals here, and they are too poor to stand the continual strain of supporting Freethought lecturers; and yet there is not a better field for Liberal work in the United States. It has a population of about seven thousand, with fourteen churches to support and $200,000 worth of untaxed church property. The younger students care nothing for the shibboleths of these gospel-mongers, and eagerly devour any new ideas or new thoughts that may be presented to them. Oh, could we hav but one man to spend three months in this place supported by the national organization and what results would follow! While here I was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Dietz, both highly respected and honored citizens of this city. Mrs. Dietz had for many years been a teacher in the University and is an accomplished linguist, and even now conducts a private class in both French and German. Mr. Dietz is a successful business man, held in high esteem by his fellow-citizens and has served in an official capacity in the district. I thoroughly enjoyed their hospitality and appreciated their kindness to me. Iowa City is by far the most beautiful place I hav visited yet. When viewed from a distance it looks just like a dense forest, with the housetops peeping out over the trees here and there. The inhabitants are exceedingly proud of it, and they hav a just cause. I leave here for Nebraska. Friends wishing to secure my services to lecture or debate are requested to address me in care of E. A. Stevens, 498 West Madison street, Chicago. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

A "New Theology" in China, Too.

At the present day, however, Confucius wields but little influence over the Chinese. In most cities are temples, or, more correctly speaking, halls known as Confucian halls. They are entirely void of any appearance of idolatry. His name is revered as a wise and good man, but he is not worshiped, nor has he in any legitimate sense been deified by the people. As Washington in America is venerated as the father of his country, and as Abraham Lincoln is spoken of in history as the savior of his country, so likewise is Confucius spoken of among his people as the wise philosopher, and patron of letters, and promoter of good government, but not as the founder of a religion, nor an object to be worshiped. Educated Chinamen all profess to be disciples of him and to read his works and to be guided by his instructions. In some respects they perhaps do, but they put their own interpretation upon the import of his teachings. There are no special teachers to expound his works and everyone is free to place such construction upon his teachings as his intelligence or impulses may lead to.

I am convinced that the power of the philosopher over his people has been overestimated by foreigners generally, and the real nature and scope of his work hav been largely misapprehended.—W. G. Benton in The Popular Science Monthly.

RELIGION has treated knowledge sometimes as an enemy, sometimes as an hostage; often as a captiv, and more often as a child; but knowledge has become of age; and religion must either renounce her acquaintance, or introduce her as a companion and respect her as a friend.—Lacon.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to THE TRUTH SEEKER and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

WE are under obligations to the following persons for new subscribers, sent since the last acknowledgment: S. P. Putnam, M. Kilborn, Paul Fisher, S. Baringer, W. Bidwell, C. E. Moore, John Boyle, C. W. Bennett, George Brown, T. Rothwell, D. C. Jenkins, J. L. Johnstone, H. F. Martin, George B. Berger, Simon Quick, O. P. Eldred, and Austin Smith. By the efforts of these friends the list has been appreciably increased. We wish a thousand or two more would do likewise, for we need and ought to hav a much larger list.

THE Bible Picture Book, we take pleasure in saying, is now under way, and will be issued as soon this fall as the work can be done and done well. The price will be $1, and it will contain a great deal for that amount. In renewing for THE TRUTH SEEKER we hope our readers will not forget to inclose the dollar for it.

James Parton.

James Parton died on the morning of October 17th after a lingering illness caused by enlargement of the heart, although until about ten days before his death he had been about and abroad, and, until very recently, able to write. He died easily, and his family, a wife and three children, were at his bedside when he passed away.

James Parton held one of the most sacred places in the heart of the present Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER because of his manly adherence to principle in the case of the Founder of this paper. Through that incident we became friends, and, though differing somewhat in some matters of policy in propagating Freethought, ever remained so. The older readers of this paper will recollect the allusion. D. M. Bennett had been placed in prison by an ecclesiastical tool, and certain pretended Liberals, jealous of Mr. Bennett's hold upon the affections of the Liberal public, thought that as he could not defend himself it would be a good opportunity to attack him. And, had it not been for James Parton, they might hav destroyed him. But with courage all the more splendid because with his fine feelings he hated to be in such a warfare by mudballs, he rebuked the Pharisees, and the tide turned. His great reputation saved a brother worker for liberty. It was a generous and a daring act, and showed that with James Parton principle was over policy. He was honest to the core and not afraid to let the world know what he thought.

To the world at large Mr. Parton was known as a biographer, and in that field of literature he easily led all contemporaneous writers. His "Life of Voltaire" is accurate and comprehensiv, and is besides a prose poem. It is as Mr. Parton's biographer says: he never claimed to be an original writer or a philosopher or scientist, but he had a wonderful faculty for manipulating and putting together the incidents in the lives of individals that made pleasant reading. He was popular with more readers than many another member of the writing fraternity, having been a voluminous contributor to the New York Ledger. He had written upon an almost incalculable variety of subjects and had been a hard worker all his days.

He was born in Canterbury, England, Feb. 9, 1822, and came to this country when five years old. He was educated in the schools of New York city and at White Plains, N. Y. After teaching in New York and Philadelphia he became a contributor to the Home Journal, with which he was connected for three years.

Since that time he has spent his life in literary labor, contributing many articles to periodicals and publishing many books on biographical subjects. While he was employed on the Home Journal he wrote the life of Horace Greeley, which had so great a success that he determined to devote his life to authorship. He has also been a successful and popular lecturer on literary and political topics.

He resided in New York city until 1875, when he removed to Newburyport, Mass. His first book was followed by a collection of "Humorous Poetry of the English Language, from Chaucer to Saxe," 1856. Next appeared the "Life and Times of Aaron Burr," prepared from original sources, in which he sought to redeem Burr's reputation from the charges that are attached to his memory, 1857 and 1864. In writing the life of Andrew Jackson he had also had access to various hitherto inedited documents.

Among the many works subsequently published by him are "General Butler in New Orleans," 1863 and 1882; "Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin," 1864; "Manual for the Instruction of Rings, Railroad and Political, and How New York is Governed," 1866; "Famous Americans of Recent Times," with sketches of Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, John Randolph and others, 1867; "The People's Book of Biography," containing eighty short lives, 1868; "Smoking and Drinking," an essay on the evils of these practices, 1869; "Topics of the Time," a collection of magazine articles, most of them treating of administrativ abuses at Washington, 1871; "Triumphs of Enterprise, Ingenuity, and Public Spirit," 1871; "The Words of Washington," 1872; "Fanny Fern, a Memorial Volume," 1872; "Life of Thomas Jefferson, Third President of the United States," 1874; "Le Parnesse Francois, a Book of French Poetry from A. D. 1550 to the Present Time," 1877; "Caricature and Other Comic Art in All Times and Many Lands," 1877; "Life of Voltaire," which was the result of several years of labor, 1881; "Noted Women of Europe and America," 1883; and "Captains of Industry, or Men of Business Who Did Something Besides Making Money, a Book for Young Americans," 1884.

In 1854, at New York, he married Mrs. Sarah Payson Willis Eldredge, a sister of the poet, Nathaniel P. Willis, she then being the widow of Mr. Eldredge, who had been cashier of a bank in Boston. The lady was widely known throughout the country as "Fanny Fern." She died in Brooklyn, N. Y., in October, 1872.

Mr. Parton was a popular man in the town where he had lived so long. He was devoted to literature, and had in the course of his long career accumulated an extensiv library, where he spent a large portion of the time. He was never a strong or over robust man, and he undoubtedly had injured his health by intense application.

He was thoroughly hospitable, and seemed to be thoroughly happy in his domestic circle. He was a good talker, especially because he said what he thought, and he thought most emphatically. He delighted in art, radicalism, and humanity; he had a "devouring rage" for literature, and it is an open question whether he was happiest in reading books or in writing them.

Mr. Parton was again married, about twenty years ago, to Miss Ellen Eldredge, a daughter of his wife by her first husband. By the laws of New York, where the parties lived at the time of the engagement, such a marriage was illegal, and they removed to Massachusetts, where no legal objection existed.

We hav lost a friend, the world an exquisit biographer, and the cause of liberty a herculean champion. He was one of the most fearless of the old guard. Living, he was to be loved. Dead, his memory is to be revered.

The Oath.

It is to be hoped that the election inspectors of this city will finally learn something as to the rights of voters to register without invoking Mumbo Jumbo either with uplifted hand or by kissing a book dirty as to cover and obscene as to contents.

A case parallel with that of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER occurred here last week, and was decided by the same judge in the same manner. Mr. John Frankenheimer has resided in the city for thirty-eight years and livs at 139 West 81st street. When Mr. Frankenheimer presented himself to be registered on October 14th he told the board that he desired to be affirmed.

The chairman informed him that he could not be affirmed unless he lifted up his right hand and uncovered his head. This Mr. Frankenheimer declined to do, saying that he had conscientious scruples against going through the form suggested. He said that Judge Barrett of the supreme court had decided that a simple affirmation without any ceremony was all that could be required. The inspector's reply was to the effect that he did not care for Judge Barrett's decision.

Mr. Frankenheimer, however, knew a great deal more than the election clerks, and he procured an order from Judge Barrett requiring the inspectors of election to show cause why a peremptory writ of mandamus should not be issued to compel them to register his name. When the case came up before Judge Barrett even the assistant corporation counsel, who appeared for the inspectors, said that there could be no question at all as to the right of Mr. Frankenheimer to be registered without complying with the ceremony insisted upon by the chairman. Judge Barrett decided of course that Mr. Frankenheimer had a perfect right to affirm in the manner he wished, and added that if any instances of this kind occurred in the future he would impose the costs of the proceeding upon the inspectors.

The people of the state already hav the oath abolished if they will contend for their rights and not be bulldozed by the ignorant ward-heelers appointed on election boards as payment for political services. Raising the hand is part of an oath, and is not required in an affirmation. Uncovering the head depends upon the place one is in, and the legal solemnity is not affected by hats on or hats off.

A Definition Applied.

In the new Manual of Morals given to the world by a few Infidels is this definition of a hypocrit and of hypocrisy:

"A hypocrit is one who attempts to deceive others in regard to his true character, especially one who pretends to virtue he does not possess." Hypocrisy: "A thing so utterly mean as to be despised alike by the good and the bad."

In a recent Christian Advocate the editor is asked whether "Sabbath" collections should be dispensed with to harmonize with the Methodist view of abstinence from all Sunday business, and Dr. Buckley replies: "The Sabbath collections are not business, in the ordinary sense of that word. They are the gifts of the people according as the Lord has prospered them. Every church should take a collection at every service, whether they hav pews or not. The gift of the poor woman's penny is as essential to her womanhood and the poor man's penny to his manhood as the larger gifts of the rich. All well-instructed persons who go to the church like an opportunity to contribute. It is a means of forming the habit in children, which will strengthen with their strength and grow with their growth to contribute. Such collections should be regarded as a religious act, given under the influence of conscience and Christian privilege. In taking collections ministers and others who manage them should keep as far as possible from the mere spirit of business. 'Bring an offering, and come into his courts. O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness,' says the Psalmist."

It is a new idea that in order to hav a rounded, full, complete character, to be manly and womanly, gifts to the church are necessary. There is nothing about this in Mr. Jackson's Manual on "Character Building," and Mr. Gilman did not codify it in his "Laws of Daily Conduct." It is evident that the Secular Union Manual will not suit the Methodists.

The evident intent of this answer is to convey the idea that giving money to ministers is a sort of sacrament, a religious act, non-performance of which will send a man to hell. This is to increase the collections. But how giving cash on Sunday to a priest for his living can be less a business transaction than giving it to him on week-days is hard for a mere layman to perceive. A good share of the average church's expense is collected on Sundays, and to call that a religious act while denouncing the giving of money for a musical entertainment as business seems to come pretty close to the definition of hypocrisy taken from our Manual.

"The horse-leech hath two daughters, crying, Giv, giv." There is one thing which is never satisfied, yea, two things which say not, It is enough: A Catholic priest in his greed of power, and a Protestant minister in his greed for pelf.

The Bishops and the Public Schools.

In arguing against public schools Roman Catholic Bishop Vaughn, of Salford, stated the case thus:

"The state has a right to come in and assist the parents to do that which they cannot do themselvs; and the parents hav a right to look to the state to giv them that assistance which they need, and provide those resources which they were not capable of providing themselvs. . . . But one thing is to help the parents to educate their children, and another thing is to take the children out of the hands of the parents and to say, 'I am not going to help you, but I am going to take your children and monopolize the whole business of education. I am not going to help you; I am going to dictate to you; I am going to make you subject to me.' The state has no right of that kind."

Bishop Vaughn is dishonest in his statement. The state does not say that. It allows every parent to educate his children in the schools which seem best to him, whether private, parochial, or public. The real grievance of the Catholics against the state is not a disposition to be tyrannical, but a refusal to furnish the Catholics funds to maintain Catholic schools. Schools in which Catholicism is not taught are regarded as monsters. Listen to the bishop of Dubuque, Iowa, talk on the question at a banquet given him recently:

"It grieves me to the soul to see the children of those who are hewers of wood and drawers of water in the land drinking in these errors. It is a constant peril to the life—the spiritual life—of the young children of the church. And my fears are not lessened by the fact that a mammoth institution had been established all over the land, in every state, in every city and in every ward. This institution is supported by wealth untold, by immense power, by legislation, sometimes in the hands of selfish and corrupt men. This mammoth institution seizes our little ones, often with the permission of their deluded parents and against the protests of God's church. They hold these little ones during the best years of their lives, until they are twenty years old. And in all these great institutions there is no place for Christ. There are our children held until the terrible day of action comes. Then they are thrown out into the world with untamed passions, yet with intellectual keenness sufficient to gratify these passions. They are unguarded by Christian training. It must be our task, our sacred duty, to rescue our children out of the grasp of that monster, that popular idol, the public school system."

That is the opinion of the bishop of Dubuque of one of our most cherished and best American institutions—that it is a monster! Not because it forcibly compels children to attend, for it does not, but because it teaches Catholic children something besides their catechism. They choose rather to hav parochial schools—places, Thoreau calls them, "not for enlightening but for obfuscating the mind; where the pupil receives only so much light as could penetrate the shadow of the Catholic church; and in which he is never educated to the degree of consciousness, but only to the degree of trust and reverence, and a child is not made a man, but kept a child." That is the sort of schools the bishop desires. He is angry if the child's mind is broadened, because breadth of mind is inconsistent with devotion to the church. The two qualities do not go together. Lack of devotion means lack of disposition to support the priest, pecuniarily and in his projects for power. Common sense in a parishioner clips the wings of a priest's ambition. A Catholic child taught in the public school is never the same devoted servant as is one taught in a parochial school. Two generations of public school makes at least an indifferentist, and an indifferentist will not go without necessaries of life in order that he may giv to the priest.

No wonder the bishop hates the public schools; but he needn't hav called the institution a monster. It betrays his feelings too plainly.

Freethought Making the Church Advance.

The eminent Rev. Dr. Vincent, to whom reference was made last week, has been forced by the Infidel scholarship of our time into a position that is well-nigh heresy. In the address quoted he further said: "The idea of inerrancy renders a true exegesis of the Bible impossible, for exegesis proceeds upon the basis of finding the truth and declaring it." Quite a truth-seeking utterance. He added: "I agree with my learned colleague, Dr. Briggs, that the scriptures must be interpreted as other human writings are, but at the same time with a proper sympathy for the divine element they contain." Human writings with a divine element must be a disheartening wilderness to puzzle out. A further remark was that when the doctrin of election was founded on an obscure passage in the New Testament, which scholarship found to hav a different meaning, Dr. Vincent thought scholarship should take precedence of the doctrin. This we think right, but the trouble is that the church does not know how on earth to get rid of the doctrin. The plaguy thing is there in black and white, and the church is ashamed to own that it has been averring to be true all this time such a false and ridiculous thing as it is. The idea that a certain number of human souls were eternally predestined to damnation came from a verse in Acts which said that "God knoweth his own," and Dr. Vincent cited this and many other instances in the Confession and in common beliefs to show the errors that had crept in from defectiv or unscholarly interpretation. "Solomon's Song does not signify the love of Christ for his church," said Dr. Vincent, "and yet this exploded allegorical interpretation underlies its citation in the Westminster standards when passages from it are given as proof-texts of the doctrin of effectual calling and of the statement that God may withdraw the light of his countenance from believers and suffer them to walk in darkness." We could hav told the doctor many years ago that Solomon's Song is but an amorous old ditty from the pen of no one knows whom, and that it has nothing to do with Christ and his church. In fact it is we who hav told the doctor so, and driven him to speak it aloud—it is we Freethinkers who by decades of effort hav so beaten this and like truths about the Bible into intelligent heads that the clergy are ashamed to preach the old absurdities any longer. It is we Freethinkers who hav really effected the whole of this modern movement toward heresy among evangelical preachers. If it had not been for our work the clergy would hav gone on preaching hell-fire, election, inerrancy, church and state, witchcraft, and all the rest till the end of the world. Thus Freethought, while discrediting the ancient miracle of making the dead walk, can exhibit to a scarce believing world its own wondrous duplicate exploit of making the church advance.

Editorial Notes.

It is now reported that Moncure D. Conway's Life of Thomas Paine, in two volumes, will be ready in January. The Infidel public, surely, will witness its coming with interest.

Sam Standring, our additional London correspondent, is one of the busiest workers for Freethought in London aside from the professional speakers. Week-days he conducts a store, and Sundays he usually speaks or presides three times at some heretical gathering. Another of our London writers, A. B. Moss, is a very prominent worker among our English cousins.

This is the way a Christian secular paper writes of the Chinese: "Formal religion in China is on its death-bed. Not one church in a hundred can boast of accommodations for its ministers that are better than a pigpen. Ruined walls, broken roofs, dirt, and decay are everywhere. The real religion of the Chinese—ancestor worship and a hybrid spiritualism—is believed in by the masses, who hav learned that they can conduct every exercise as satisfactorily as a professional. The higher classes are almost entirely Agnostics." We trust that the statements made are true. We wish the medicin-men everywhere, of all nations, were left to work or starve—Mohammedan and Indian, Christian as well as Chinese.

The clergy of Kansas City are diplomats, says a Western paper, and do not propose to cut off their collectiv noses to spite their faces. When a good brother, zealous for the reform of the Sunday press, introduced a resolution in the ministers' meeting calling upon editors to publish church notices on Saturday or not at all the assembled brethren promptly cut the "or not at all" out of the resolution and passed the rest. This leaves the astute parsons in the happy position of the orthodox Catholic who, upon demanding fish of his restaurateur on a Friday and receiving the response that there was none, shouted with glee, "Bring me a rattling good cut of roast beef. The Lord knows I asked for fish."

Mr. C. A. Lindsay, of Butte, Montana, followed the advice we giv as to the effort to keep the World's Fair open on Sundays, and in return received the following: "I hav your letter of the 10th inst., inclosing a clipping and protesting against closing the Exposition on Sunday. The matter to which you refer will not be decided for over a year yet, but your communication will be placed with others relating to the same subject, all of which will receive respectful consideration at the proper time. Very respectfully, Benj. Butterworth, secretary." We hav, then, a good long time to work on this matter, and it should be fully improved. We hope each subscriber will keep his Truth Seeker of October 10th, in which are the names and addresses of the National Commission, and write to his state commissioner protesting against closing the Fair, and also send clippings giving name, date, and place of publication—showing the sentiment of the press. When the local directory is chosen for the final year we will publish their names so that they too can be influenced.

The San Francisco Evening Post has this to say regarding the effort to close the World's Fair on Sundays: "The governing body or bodies of the World's Fair are going to be very much worried over the question of whether the Exposition shall be open or closed on Sunday. It is certain that whatever decision is reached people will be offended, so the directory may just as well decide as it thinks right and proper, without regard to petitions or protests or remonstrances or anything of the kind. Those who oppose keeping the Exposition open on Sunday seem to forget that no one will be compelled to visit the World's Fair on that day any more than he or she is compelled to go to church, which is always kept open on Sunday. All the directory can do at most is to giv people an opportunity to visit the Exposition on Sunday if they desire. The question of Sabbath-breaking each must settle for himself. Another thing seems to escape the attention of the opponents of Sunday opening, which is that if the World's Fair be closed on Sunday hundreds and thousands of people will not be able to visit it at all. Men and women who work six days in the week, early and late, must go to the Fair on Sunday, if at all, and these people are entitled to the highest consideration in a matter of this sort. It is very easy to say that working men and women can go in the evening, but if those who say this so glibly will try a whole day's work, from 7 in the morning to 6 at night, or even later, they will find how much disposition or capacity they hav left for good pleasuring. We think the good judgment of the directory may be trusted not to deprive the working men and women of their only chance to visit the World's Fair."

The Christian missionaries do not, it seems, hav things all their own way in Japan. One of them writes to a little mission journal published in Boston that the governor of one province has written a letter instructing the school authorities to hire no Christians as teachers. He adds: "Some apologize for the governor's letter by saying that special relations to any religion is not permitted in the schools. This may hav been the meaning of our governor's letter, but the school authorities so interpret it as to privately encourage Buddhism and publicly oppose Christianity. The school authorities of Japan so interpret the government prohibition of religious teaching in the schools to mean opposition to Christianity. A Christian teacher in a Tokyo school lately refused to bow to the emperor's signature exhibited in the school for that purpose on the emperor's birthday. Such an excitement occurred that he considered it wise to resign his position. The excitement spread over the country. The Christians were everywhere denounced for disloyalty. Some Christians expressed their loyalty by being disloyal to God, leaving their church and giving up their faith. The Buddhists held mass meetings throughout the empire denouncing the Christian faith. The Christians themselvs were divided on the main question, "Is it idolatry to bow to the emperor's signature?" the Congregationalists generally denying and the Presbyterians affirming that it is worship; both sides in the mean time being generally abused and our religion slandered by the heathen. Thus here in Sendai the Buddhist priests hired the largest theater with the help of some of the professors and students of the government local college, and held mass meetings nightly for a week. The students attended the Christian meetings and howled down any explanation." If the missionaries stopped to think of the impudent arrogance of their attitude toward people whom they dub heathen they might find reasons why they should not be surprised that the Japanese desire none of their religion.

Letters from Friends.

Advance Move in Elsinore.

ELSINORE, CAL., Oct. 12, 1891.

MR EDITOR: I would like to correspond with some young professor who would like to help establish a hall in which to lecture Sunday forenoons and evenings and hav some kind of literary or musical exercises on Thursday evenings, suitable for teaching the young and even the older ones useful knowledge, morality, and good citizenship, games or good manners. In fact to make it such an attractiv meeting-place for all classes as to take the place of superstitious worship of the impossible. Very truly, F. H. HEALD.

Distributing Good Meat Instead of Slush.

DEERFIELD, IA., Oct. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When I wrote you last I promised when I renewed my subscription if I could not get a new subscriber I would make THE TRUTH SEEKER a present to some one, and not being able to get a new subscriber in accordance with my promis I will inclose my order for $5, for which please renew my subscription and send THE TRUTH SEEKER to party named in my order. There are a great many people in our township that ought to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, but the church has left its stamp upon them and I am sorry there are so many starving their mental faculties by feeding on such slush as the church can deal out when there is so much good food within their reach.

GEORGE BROWN.

Some Blasphemous Jokes and Phrases.

NOVELTY, CAL., Sept. 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2—$1 for another TRUTH SEEKER binder and the balance for the Freethought cause. I can get you no subscribers. All the people here are Liberal but want no Liberal paper; they say they can use the money for a better purpose. I am sorry Freethought went under, but am glad to see it coupled to THE TRUTH SEEKER, as we Liberals on the Pacific coast will hav a show to hear from each other once in a while. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will get all the old Freethought subscribers. Good luck to Heston—his Blind Leading the Blind is capital, as are all his pictures. Judging from his pictures, the she angels predominate in the New Jerusalem, which no doubt makes Abraham feel glad when called upon to do the bosom business. Yours to down old Christ and all other bilks,

HENRY DANNENBRINK.

The Wastes of Religion.

LEXINGTON, KY., Sept. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Bishop Spalding remarks that "man is created for a supernatural end, that complete life is life in God." This is an attempt to project legitimate realities into a ghostly and airy future, of which he knows nothing, the existence of which he cannot prove with any degree of certainty. The ghouls and angelic fairies who people this fantastic region, with their master, are supposed to possess the power to exalt the imagination of man, giving the only holy and desirable impetus known to his desires, giving firmness to his virtuous exercise of will. To reach this cloudland is the best, the noblest object of his existence, and to educate his children in the knowledge of these vagaries and dreams is to sanctify their aims, with all that they include of virtuous emotion and action. Is not this trifling with a vengeance, and that, too, for a master in Israel who expects the whole thoughtful world to sit at his feet and learn of him—an able writer, who could easily teach us ways that make for righteousness? All this is necessary to prop up an immense temple, where his friends may repose. The main column of this edifice is the credulity of man. Shame! more than this! multitudes of our fairest, best young women are daily devoting themselvs as slaves that this unholy enterprise may prosper. Slaves, trifling their sweet lives away in convents, their tenderest feelings enlisted under a banner of fraud and imposition, without dignified mental or moral profit to themselvs in this world or any condition which could reasonably be its supplement or effect. Talented young men, who are wearing themselvs out ignobly. It is said that they die off rapidly, and it is difficult to keep up a supply, great exertion being necessary to bolster up the machine and keep it in splendid running order. ALHAZA.

The Words "Belief" and "Knowledge."

CLEAR CREEK, TEX., Oct. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for your most estimable paper, which has become a household necessity to me. The pictures are enough to open the eyes of the blind, even those that won't see. If your space is not too limited, I would like to answer a correspondent, whose letter appeared in your paper some time ago, and which I hav intended to answer for some time, but hav hitherto neglected. I do not remember his name, and although I hav looked over THE TRUTH SEEKER for several weeks back, I hav failed to find it, but he said that he could not understand how a person could say that he knows a certain thing to be a fact, and therefore believes it. Now, it is the very reverse with me. I cannot see how a person can believe anything that cannot be proved to be a fact. As I take it, that is the chief difference between religionists and Liberals or Infidels—the religionists believe something which they nor anyone else can prove, and the Liberals or Infidels believe nothing that cannot be proved to be a fact or reality. I think that belief with our friend is a misnomer. That he has somewhat imbibed of religious teachings in that respect is very plain, for the religionists believe not what reason suggests, or what scientific truths demonstrate, but rather what hope, fear, and fancy dictate. However, if our friend or anyone else can convince me to the contrary, I am open to conviction, but he will surely hav to produce some stubborn facts in order to do so.

Hoping I hav not occupied too much of your valuable space, and wishing you and the cause you hav espoused every success, I remain yours for mental and moral elevation,

T. COOK.

Nature, Not God, the Supreme One.

SALEM, UTAH, Oct. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: There are a few Liberal-minded men in Salem who are in a state of evolution. A little aid "via" Freethought literature might hasten the event. Would you please send to each of the parties named on the opposit side of this sheet a copy of your invaluable paper, and oblige a truth seeker? You are at liberty to publish the following verses, if they merit so much attention. C. F. HULL.

The universe is ever bright and fair,
No maker formed it, Nature does declare;
Yet man is ever trying to find
In superstition an all-creating mind.
He claims to trace his origin to a clod,
And attributes his evolution to a God,
But reason now arises to proclaim
God is a fiction, empty is the name.

Those brilliant orbs we see with upturned face
Eternally revolved through boundless space;
They seem to say there is no end to time
And superstition's all that is "divine."
There is a God, the fools of earth do cry;
"There is no God," all Nature does reply,
"I, Nature, am supreme and evermore shall reign
O'er the universe, my elegant domain."

Superstition fades before the torch of reason,
As leaves do fade in the autumnal season;
And truth will finally predominate,
While superstition justly meets its fate.
Atheists may meet with ministerial frowns,
Truth is more glorious than priestly crowns;
Nature's truths are wingless, yet can fly;
Imbued with life eternal, they will never die.

God's Bad Character.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS.,
Oct. 12, ANNO SCIENTIA 291.

MR EDITOR: I confess my inability to solve this incomprehensible jugglery anent all this God-in-the-Constitution business. I hav at last found out that the First Reformed Presbyterian church folks will not let their members vote until somebody else has voted Abraham's God into our Constitution.

Great Scott! is he not a foreigner? and is he not holding office among his own people, the Jews? And surely he must hav more business on hand than he can attend to or he would never hav employed his friend and co-worker, the frozen-souled Russ, to help him exterminate what there is left of this precious "seed of Abraham." Do not the Presbyterians know that this Jew-God has burnt in his brimstone hell all their unbaptized babies, and would they now install this infernal monstrosity in office at the head of our government? Never can the nations of the earth be truly blessed until this hydra-headed Christian God has been erased from memory's seat. Here are a few short passages for the First Reformed Presbyterian church to read and ponder on:

"Thus saith the Lord. . . . Slay both man and woman, infant and suckling." "Prepare slaughter for his children for the iniquity of their fathers." "Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children, and women." "I will not pity, nor spare, nor hav mercy, but destroy them" (1 Sam. xv, 2, 3; Isa. xiv, 21; Ezek. ix, 6; Jer. xiii, 13).

Jeremiah was one of this God's special prophets, and will be accepted as a competent witness anent his God's character by all Christians. Hear Jerry's accusation against this Lord God:

"O Lord God of hosts, I sat not in the assembly of mockers, nor rejoiced; I sat alone because of thy hand: for thou hast filled me with indignation. Why is my pain perpetual, and my wound incurable, which refuseth to be healed? Wilt thou be altogether unto me as a liar, and as waters that fail?" (Jer. xv, 16, 18).

After hearing Jerry and other reliable witnesses concerning the character of this Lord God, doubtless these Presbyterian bigots will be content with the name of Jesus alias Christ in our Constitution, and no doubt he will get there. Thus, hear him: "Those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me" (J. Christ, Esq). NELSON HUNT.

The Georgia Wonder Not So Wonderful.

HURON, S. D., Oct. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Through the courtesy of I know not whom, I hav received two copies of your valuable paper (speed its course), one of August 29th and one of September 26th. In the former was a communication from Mr. C. E. Werst, of Miles City, Mont., touching on the matter of Annie Abbott, the "little Georgia Magnet," and quoting a communication from the Minneapolis Journal as to my exposé of her show at Aberdeen, S. D., on August 8th. In the latter paper is a defense of Mrs. Abbott by Mr. J. L. Tompkins, of Lake City, Ia., in which some strong epithets are indulged in and some untruths told. Permit me, sir, through your valuable paper to say somewhat in my own defense and as to this exposure. I send you a copy of the Aberdeen News containing the full account. Make such use of it as you see fit. I was one of a committee on the stage during the performance here and, as is always the case, was fully deceived. Outside investigation and a second viewing led to the detection of the whole deception. In this I lay claim to but a minor part, for several were uniting their efforts in bringing about this result. It fell to Mr. Frank Brisbine and me to make the public exposure at Aberdeen, my home. I lay claim to no special smartness and believe Iowa to be full of smarter men, but in the light of all the facts I now wonder how smart men can be so easily deceived. Now for a few facts. At the Aberdeen performance Mrs. Abbott, knowing what was coming, played sick and only did five tricks out of twelve, and those the most difficult ones. We then took the stage, the audience of over five hundred being nearly solidly against us in matter of sympathy, and, after as full an explanation as the commotion would permit of, we performed all of the tricks Mrs. Abbott had shown, together with all she had omitted. Not a trick but what we could do by the application of simple mechanical forces which she, as a woman and with the advantage of flowing robes and the further advantage of a credulous audience, very deftly conceals. I offered Mrs. Abbott $250 if I could not lift her or hold her up, and called upon the mayor to hold the money, but my offer was declined. The most powerful men could not lift me or push me over, although bent upon defeating us. In the end the house unanimously voted the Abbott show a "fake" and the exposure complete. Mr. Tompkins tells what is untrue (whether knowingly or not I cannot say) when he writes that "a committee chosen to investigate the matter in full" did so act and reported the exposure as untrue. No such committee was ever appointed or acted or reported, for the assembled public was its own committee and voted the Abbott show a "fake." Further, Mr. Abbott published a notice agreeing to giv a second show and vindicate himself, but when my article explaining each trick in detail was published he forthwith "skipped the country," canceling all his remaining Dakota engagements, and sought new pastures in Canada, since which time, as I hav been recently informed, Mrs. Abbott has taken a place under a new name in a Chicago dime museum. Her career as Annie Abbott has been run, owing to the wide publicity given to the exposé One further fact is of value as going to show the falsity of all their claims. For a swindling show must always support itself on a foundation of untruth. Prof. D. T. Walker, of Watertown, S. D., wrote to Thomas A. Edison asking if he had for three days investigated Mrs. Abbott's powers, as claimed by Mr. Abbott. In reply to this Mr. A. V. Gates, private secretary to Mr. Edison, writes from Orange, N. J.: "I beg to state that Mr. Edison is not acquainted with this young lady, and that the statement in regard to his interview with her is entirely erroneous." I wrote to the secretary of the faculty of Harvard University asking whether she was ever examined by the Harvard faculty, as claimed, and whether they had pronounced her power to be a form of "hypnotic suggestion." In reply from Cambridge, Mass., September 4th, Mr. Frank Bolles, secretary, says, "So far as I know none of the members of the faculty ever saw her," and "the Harvard faculty never directly or indirectly, made any examination into the powers of the 'Little Georgia Magnet.'" Here then is a direct and positiv refutation, from unimpeachable sources, of two barefaced lies told nightly in order to giv a color of respectability to a barefaced swindle.

The case may be summed up in this, that their declarations are pure lies and their entire performance one which any lady can duplicate, and hence it is a "fake" and a swindle to travel on the false claim that Mrs. Abbott is possessed of unusual or supernatural powers. If the claim was that she possessed a marvelous strength and power to deceive the eye by most dextrous movements and quick application of mechanical forces, then the truth would be told and she might be voted a success and not a fakir. W. P. BUTLER.

On The Prize Manual, and Politics.

NEW YORK, Oct. 22, E M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: For over a year I hav anxiously awaited the publication of the Prize Manual; and it was I who recently asked THE TRUTH SEEKER for news concerning the book.

While out in a country town this summer, I met a lady who said she preferred to giv a book to a child, instead of toys and other presents. Her favorit book on such occasions was "Uncle Tom's Cabin." At my next opportunity I read this antislavery novel (for the first time, although having a previous general knowledge of its contents), my intention being to compare it with the forthcoming Prize Manual, and then decide which would be of more benefit to a child.

But having read your criticism, Mr. Editor, of the Prize Manual, I confess that I am disappointed with the book—not on account of the price ($1 50), but because the Manual is still incomplete. It consists of two works bound in one volume by two authors who take particular pains to let readers know that they are "friends to religion," and that it is deemed "inexpedient to teach morals on a religious basis there"—in the public schools.

"Friends to religion" and "inexpedient there" make me laugh—with indignation.

I hav a brother-in-law who is also a "friend to religion" (for years a Sabbath-school superintendent), and who might be easily induced to write an appendix to the Manual showing how children should avoid other offenses toward a "Being" (God) besides swearing. As he is a religious zealot no money would be asked for the addendum—nothing approaching the original prize money. I intended ordering three Manuals, one for a teacher and one for a nephew and niece; but I shall wait awhile till I can personally examin th prize book. In the mean time, what other similar book teaching secular morality can THE TRUTH SEEKER specially recommend?

The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" which I bought is doing excellent missionary work. After showing it to members of the family and house, and to business patrons and callers, I sent it to a factory, where the superintendent exhibited it to workmen and neighbors; it then passed to a lifelong Freethinker, who showed the "Text-Book" to over a dozen persons in his residence. The book has been circulating in Brooklyn, and is at present in the lonely home of a poor clam-digger, where the children look at the pictures daily. I wrote on its fly-leaf instructions to keep the book covered, clean, and to be returned to its owner when done with its perusal.

As soon as your Bible Picture Book is printed, I shall buy one.

Another matter. Now that election-day is drawing near, let me entreat my Freethought friends and other Liberals, particularly the young men who will cast their first ballot, to learn the platform of each of the four parties, and to find out the measures and principles (not men) they wish to hav advanced. Both Republican and Democratic parties are alike—they stand for capitalistic monopoly, oppression of the people, and corruption.

The Prohibitionists try to teach temperance, but in a harsh, restrictiv way. Advanced thinkers would solve the liquor problem by abolishing the element of profit, by having the government make liquors and sell them at cost price through officials. (Consider the postal service.) The Prohibition party is practically useless; do not waste a vote for it.
